as in the present case, four different bodies are deemed to hold this bridge in common, and, in the next place, are to be obliged to contribute in certain proportions, which may be fixed by the Secretary of State, to the building and maintaining of the bridge, each of these parties should have a voice in the management; and that being so, I do not think that there is much difficulty in finding that the previous provision in subsection 3 of section 37 may be held to be fairly applicable to this matter of management. The words that are used are these,—“The management of the bridge shall, failing agreement, be vested in a committee (hereafter called the joint bridge committee), to be appointed by the trustees or local authorities chargeable with the cost of maintenance and rebuilding.” If that had been in a substantive clause by itself instead of merely in a subsection of section 37, there would have been no difficulty about it. The very language of it applies to the case we have been dealing with,—the management of the bridge shall be vested in a committee to be appointed by the local authorities chargeable with the cost of maintenance and rebuilding. Well, the language being wide enough, I do not think it is controlled so as to be entirely applicable to what goes before. If we can fairly read that general language as applicable to the case of bridges which have to be maintained by more than one local authority, then it directly applies to this case, and my opinion is that it can be so read. It appears to me that each of these parties is entitled to have representation upon this bridge committee, practically as provided in section 39, which I think applies to the case. I have said that even in a case where the management is confined to those who really have the property you may have three different bodies, each represented by five commissioners, but each having only one vote when a question arises. In this case there is the addition of another party, because four of them have used the bridge, and four of them have to contribute to its maintenance, but I am of opinion that as the burden of rebuilding and maintenance will lie upon these four parties, so the right of management will be vested in them also.

LORD ADAM.—This Dalmarnock bridge is locally situated partly in the county of the Lower Ward of Lanarkshire and partly in the burgh of Glasgow, and therefore beyond all doubt it falls under section 37 of the Roads and Bridges Act. Now, so long as it is allowed to remain under that section there is no doubt whatever that the expenses of managing, maintaining, and rebuilding it must be borne equally by the county and burgh in which it is locally situated, and that irrespective altogether of the amount of traffic from the county or burgh respectively which the bridge accommodates. There is no doubt that is the provision of section 37. Now, I think the reason why that is left undisturbed by the Act is this, that before the Act the situation of matters was that half of that bridge belonged to the burgh and half of it belonged to the county, and the expense of maintaining and repairing that bridge must have been borne equally by them, because the expense would be presumably the same, and I take it that so long as matters remained in that position it was not the intention of the statute to interfere with the existing state of matters. These parties were equally liable before the passing of the Act, and I think the Act meant to leave them in that position so long as the bridge was left to be the property of these two owners. Therefore I think that was a sufficient reason why what may have been, as Lord Shand said, a more equitable charge and distribution of the expense was not made between the two bodies so long as it was left under section 37, and I think the only change which the 37th section operated upon the rights of the parties was this, that instead of leaving the half of the expense to be borne by each separately, it declared that the bridge should from that time thereafter be joint property and it provided for joint management, but presumably it did not interfere with the previous liability as to the expense, because, as I have said, presumably the expense was equal before.

No. 167.

July 8, 1887.
Lower Ward
of Lanarkshire Road Trustees
v. Magistrates
of Glasgow.

But then we have here an application, and what is admittedly a competent application, to bring this bridge under section 88 of the statute. It cannot be disputed, after the decision in the Hillhead case, that this bridge is one to which the provisions of section 88 apply, because it was held in that case that although a bridge may be locally situated in more than one county or burgh—in two, or it may be three—in such a case it nevertheless falls within the 88th section provided it accommodates what was called in the Hillhead case outside traffic. Now, it will be observed that section 88 for the first time introduced what I think was an entirely new element in the matter, because it introduced for the first time a liability on the part of other parties, burghs or counties, in which the bridge was not locally situated, to contribute to the expense of maintaining such a bridge; and that introduced an entirely new set of circumstances, as it appears to me, from any that existed before. Now, the Legislature has thought that in such circumstances, where in point of fact a bridge, although locally situated it might be in one district or it might be in two districts, did in point of fact afford accommodation to outside districts,—that is to say, to districts in which it was not locally situated—in such cases the outside authorities should contribute to the expense of the bridge. That might have been done very simply by leaving the property of the bridge in the single proprietor as it was before, or in the joint proprietors as it was before, and merely calling upon the outside parties to contribute by way of toll, or money, or otherwise, to the support of that bridge. That would have been a simple way, and if the Legislature had adopted that way, as the city of Glasgow thinks, then it would undoubtedly have left the mutual liabilities as between the first and second parties here undisturbed. But then it was liable to this objection, and we see from this case that it was a serious objection, that it would have left these outside parties to contribute, it might be, large sums of money over the expenditure of which they would in that view have no control, and that that might be a heavy burden we see from this case, because we are told in the case that this very bridge over the Clyde at Glasgow requires to be immediately rebuilt, and I suppose it will not be rebuilt for any small sum of money; and if, as the city of Glasgow maintain, all that the outside authorities have to do is to contribute to the expense, they would have been called upon to contribute large sums of money without having any control or say in the disposal of it. Now, that being so, it does not appear to me that that is the mode which the Act has adopted to meet the case. I think the mode which the Act has adopted to meet the case is this: Instead of leaving the bridge the property of the one or two proprietors as it was before, the Act has declared that this bridge shall be deemed common property to all those who are bound by the Act to contribute to its support. I think that is very clearly the mode which the Act has adopted to meet the circumstances. It has declared that the bridge in future shall belong in common to all the parties who contribute to it, and as the amount of traffic passing over that bridge might not be equal in all the four cases, it has been left to the Secretary of State in express

No. 167.

July 8, 1887.
Lower Ward
of Lanarkshire Road Trustees
v. Magistrates
of Glasgow.

words to determine the proportion in which each proprietor shall contribute to the expense of the bridge. Now, I think that depends, as Lord Mure has pointed out, upon the construction particularly of the 2d and 4th subsections of the 88th section. By the 2d subsection the clerk to the county or burgh authority is to apply to the Secretary of State to determine that any such bridge shall belong in common to the county or counties and burgh or burghs to be named in his determination. I think it is beyond doubt that if the Secretary of State is so to determine, he must name in his determination all the authorities of the county or counties and burgh or burghs who contribute to the maintenance of the bridge, or are to be liable for it. I cannot understand his omitting from the declaration as to the common proprietors the name of any one of the four. Well, if the Secretary of State on considering the matter thinks that outside counties or burghs are bound to contribute, what he is to do is set forth in subsection 4. He is to determine "the proportions in which such burden,"—that is, the burden of maintaining, repairing, and, if need be, rebuilding the bridge—"should be borne by the county or counties, or part or parts, or district or districts, of such county or counties, and by the burgh or burghs named in the determination." Now, what are the county or counties, or burgh or burghs, named in the determination if they are not those, and those only, and all of those which the Secretary of State considers are bound to contribute? Then, if the effect of that section is to declare that the bridge which was previously the property of one burgh or county in which it might be locally situated, or of the burgh and county, as in this case, in which it might be locally situated, is to be no longer their property, but is to become the common property of all the contributors, then, if that be so—and I think it is so by the Act—I think that leads to the solution of the second question here, because if this bridge is to belong in future to all the four as their common property, it appears to me that there is no difference in the quality of the rights of these four. They are all proprietors. It is not that two of these are proprietors and two contributors. The Act does not point at that at all. I cannot see how, if it belongs in common property to them all, you can say they have not all equal rights over it, unless there shall be something in the statute saying they shall not have equal rights. But there is nothing to that effect in the statute. I think it is clear upon the statute that they are all four common owners, and not that two of them are owners and two of them merely contributors, as is the view of the City of Glasgow. Now, if that be the position of matters, and if they are all common owners, then I think it follows that no one of these common proprietors or common owners has more right than another to the exclusive management of the bridge. If they are all common owners, why should one or two have the exclusive management and the others not? I think that follows as a consequence if the first proposition be right—I mean always apart from something in the Act to the contrary, and I think there is nothing in the Act. Well, if they are all entitled, and as I think necessarily entitled, to the management of this bridge, I think it follows they are entitled to appoint representatives, and though it is quite true that in section 88 there are no special provisions as to a joint committee, you will observe that difficulty or presumed difficulty might have arisen quite as much if we had been dealing with a bridge situated only in one county or one burgh. I mean there is no special provision in section 37 itself as to the extent to which each of them shall send members to any joint committee of management. But I think that is a difficulty which, as Lord Shand No. 167. says, we ought to get over by going back to see what the rights of the joint committee are under this Act, where a joint committee is necessary and is provided for; and accordingly, on the whole matter, I agree with Lord Mure.

July 8, 1887.
Lower Ward
of Lanarkshire Road Trustees
v. Magistrates
of Glasgow.

LORD PRESIDENT.—The contention of the Magistrates of Glasgow is that the Secretary of State has only the function of determining in what proportions the county or burgh, or counties or burghs brought in for the first time to contribute under section 88, are to be burdened with the expense, and that as regards the two original owners of the bridge their liability is to be equal, as it was before the 88th section was applied, and that they are to bear equally the balance of the expense not provided by the other two districts. In the former case between The Magistrates of Glasgow and The Police Commissioners of Hillhead, I was of opinion that the 88th section of the statute did not apply to a bridge jointly owned and maintained by two bodies of road trustees, and one of the reasons which induced me to form that opinion, and to express it pretty strongly, was this—that if the 88th section was held to apply to bridges so owned and maintained, the Secretary of State would have power, if he thought it equitable and just, to disturb the equality of the burden which was established in such cases by the 37th section of the statute; and I understand that the foundation of your Lordships' opinion in this case is that it is quite open to the Secretary of State to apportion the liability among the four different bodies of road trustees that are here before us in a way that is just and equitable, without any reference whatever to the quality of liability established by section 37. Now, I am bound to give effect to that judgment here, and therefore to concur with your Lordships in that construction of the 88th section, it being now conclusively determined that the 88th section does apply not only to bridges owned by one party, but to bridges owned and administered and maintained by two bodies of road trustees jointly.

THE COURT pronounced this interlocutor:—"Find and declare that the Secretary of State has power under the Roads and Bridges (Scotland) Act, 1878, to determine, if he sees fit, that Dalmarnock Bridge shall be deemed to belong in common to the county of the Lower Ward of Lanark, the city of Glasgow, the county of the Middle Ward of Lanark, and the burgh of Rutherglen, and to apportion among them in his determination, in such way as he thinks right, the expense of managing, maintaining, repairing, and if need be rebuilding said bridge, and the county of the Middle Ward of Lanark and the burgh of Rutherglen are entitled to take part in the management of said bridge, and to appoint representatives on the joint bridge committee thereof, and decern: Find the second party liable in expenses to the first and third parties," &c.

MACKENZIE & BLACK, W.S.—CAMPBELL & SMITH, S.S.C.—BRUCE & KERR, W.S.— MACKENZIE & BLACK, W.S.—Agents.

JOHN CARSWELL & SON, Pursuers (Appellants).—Gloag—McKechnie. No. 168.
ALEXANDER HENRY FINLAY, Defender (Respondent).—D.-F. Mackintosh
—C. S. Dickson.

July 8, 1887.
Carswell &
Son v. Finlay.

Ship—Sale—Purchaser's liability for furnishings prior to sale.—The owner of certain shares in a vessel sold them, and delivered a bill of sale to the pur-

No. 168. July 8, 1887. Carswell & Son v. Finlay. chaser. At the time the vessel was completely fitted and provisioned and laden with a cargo for a voyage under a charter-party. The ship was lost on the voyage. In an action subsequently brought by the managing owner against the purchaser for the proportion effeiring to his shares of the cost of repairs executed before the sale, and of provisions for the voyage, on the ground that he would have been entitled to a share of the freight if earned, held (1) that the purchaser was not liable for repairs executed prior to the sale, and (2) that although the cost of provisions for the voyage would have been a proper deduction from the gross freight if earned, yet as they had not been bought on the purchaser's credit he had incurred no liability.

1ST DIVISION. Sheriff of Renfrew and Bute. M. THE registered owners of the barque "Arran" of Greenock were John Carswell & Son, who held 42/64th shares, and were managing owners, and Duncan Stewart Hendry of Greenock, who held the remaining 22/64ths.

On 11th November 1885, John Carswell & Son, as managing owners, entered into a charter-party, whereby she was chartered to sail to Mobile and bring home a cargo of timber to this country.

In order to prepare her for the voyage she was repaired at considerable expense, a crew engaged, and various furnishings made, all which was managed by John Carswell & Son as managing owners. She was ready for sea by 5th December 1885, and sailed on her voyage. John Carswell & Son made certain disbursements after that date, also on account of the ship.

On 5th December 1885, Hendry executed a bill of sale in favour of A. H. Finlay of Greenock, of his 22/64th shares in the ship. This bill of sale was not intimated to Carswell & Son, nor was it ever registered. The transaction was truly a security to Finlay for certain obligations by Hendry to him. After it Hendry left Greenock and went to reside in London. The "Arran" was lost on the homeward voyage from Mobile, and no freight was earned.

Carswell & Son brought this action in the Sheriff Court of Renfrewshire against Finlay, to recover from him £243, 1s. 7d. They stated that, as managing owners, they had disbursed for the vessel for repairs, outfit, wages, and provisions, £707, 2s. 11d., of which the proportion falling to the defender's 22/64th shares was £243, 1s. 7d. The defender admitted liability for disbursements subsequent to 5th December 1885, the date of the bill of sale, but disputed liability for the expenditure prior to that date.

He pleaded, inter alia;—(3) In any case the items contained in the account sued for not having been incurred on the instructions, or on the credit, or by the authority of the defender, he is not responsible therefor, and ought to be assoilzied with expenses.

The parties arranged to divide the accounts into three heads A, B, C. Account A was a "List of debts incurred and paid for wages and other disbursements of ship after the date of the bill of sale." The defender admitted liability for his proportion of these debts, amounting to £54 6s. 4d., and on 30th July 1886 interim decree was granted by the Sheriff-substitute for that sum.

Account B was a "List of debts incurred and paid for wages and other disbursements of ship before date of bill of sale." It contained items for labour and for stores, coal, and the like put on board the ship with a view to the voyage to Mobile and back, on which the ship was lost.

Account C was a "List of debts incurred and paid for repairs, all incurred prior to the date of the bill of sale." It represented the cost of repairs made to prepare her for the same voyage.

It was admitted in a joint minute of admissions put in as the proof in the cause that the disbursements were all made by Carswell & Son, and it was also admitted that the defender "became owner, and assumed the rights of ownership of 22/64ths of the barque 'Arran,' on the 5th day of December 1885, the date of the bill of sale."

No. 168.
—
July 8, 1887.
Carswell &
Son v. Finlay.

The Sheriff-substitute (Nicolson) pronounced this interlocutor (after findings of fact to the effect above narrated):—"Finds that the defender is not liable for any part of the expenses stated in the accounts marked B and C in the minute of admissions, in respect that they were incurred before he became a part owner of the ship; that he admits liability for his proportion of the list marked A, amounting to £54, 6s. 4d.; that interim decree for that sum was granted on 30th July last: Quoad ultra assolizies the defender from the conclusions of the action."*

On appeal the Sheriff (Moncreiff) affirmed the judgment.†

* "NOTE.—This case raises an interesting question in maritime law, which was argued with force and ingenuity on both sides. The accounts B and C are not exactly in the same position, but the pursuers hold that the defender is equally liable for his share of both. The account B is for expenses connected with the outfit and victualling of the ship before she sailed on 5th December 1885, and it was contended for the pursuers that the defender became a partner in the adventure on which she was then under charter by becoming an owner in the month of December, and that he is liable for his share of the preparatory expenses. I am unable to come to that conclusion. The charter-party is between John Carswell of Greenock and James Hunter of Mobile, Carswell being the managing owner of the ship. Hendry was a party to that contract, and responsible for his share of all the debts of the ship at the time it was entered into, and up to the date of his ceasing to be an owner. The defender was no party to the contract, and his purchase of Hendry's shares did not operate as a transfer to him of the debts then due by Hendry as an owner. He was entitled to believe that he was acquiring a property unburdened by debt, and if the pursuer's argument be well founded he would have been equally liable for his share of these debts if they had been thousands instead of hundreds of pounds. That he should incur such a responsibility for shares for which he paid £180 is extravagant. 'It would be difficult,' said Sir Robert Phillimore, in the case of the 'Aneroid' (April 17, 1877, 2 Law Rep. Prob. Div. 189), 'to see what principle of equity could render the purchaser, who, it must be presumed, had paid the full value of the repaired ship, liable for the debt of the vendee to the repairing tradesmen, with whom the purchaser had no contract at all.' A great many authorities were quoted on both sides, but the law of the case seems to be briefly summed up in one sentence of Lord Tenterden's opinion in the case of Jennings v. Griffiths (1 Ryan and Moodie, 42),—'The true question in matters of this description is, upon whose credit was the work done?' The work here was done on the credit of the owners of the ship at the time, and before the defender had anything to do with her. He had no more to do with the ordering of these repairs or the paying for them than he had to do with the building of the ship. Hendry had, and I notice that the greater part of the repairs account, to the amount of £205, 9s., has been paid to him and his firm."

† "NOTE.—It is admitted in the able argument for the pursuers that there is no express decision in favour of the claim now made. The novelty of the claim throws a heavy burden on the pursuers. Parties have renounced probation on a very meagre and somewhat ambiguous minute of admissions, and therefore the grounds of the pursuers' case must be found within the four corners of the record and minute. The pursuers' contention practically comes to this, that a purchaser's liability for repairs and furnishings made to a vessel before the date of purchase is to be inferred from the bare fact of the purchase of a share of the vessel, although the bill of sale is not registered or intimated to other owners, and although no freight is earned, and no claim for freight is made by the purchaser. Now, the general rule undoubtedly is that the purchaser of a share of a vessel is not liable for repairs and furnishings made to it

No. 168.

July 8, 1887.
Carswell &
Son v. Finlay.

The pursuers appealed, and argued;—The question was whether the owner who purchased a vessel while on a charter-party for a voyage was not liable for disbursements made by the managing owner to fit her for it. Now, prima facie, such a purchaser by becoming owner acquired the right to freight,¹ and it followed that such a purchaser must be liable, whether freight was earned or not, for the advances before the date of the purchase, for the simple reason that such repairs and furnishings are not made upon his credit. The cases quoted in the Sheriff-substitute's note are illustrations of this rule, and it is recognised by the writers on maritime law—See MacLachlan and Abbot on Shipping, Bell's Pr., section 448, and Bell's Comm. (7th ed.) 568-9. It therefore lies upon the pursuers to shew why the general rule should not receive effect in this case, and they profess to do so in this way. They say that in virtue of the purchase of Hendry's 22/64th parts of the vessel the defender became entitled to the freight to be earned under the current charter-party as an incident of ownership; and that as he could not have claimed a share of freight except after deduction of the expenses necessary to earn it he is liable to bear his share of those expenses, although no freight has in point of fact been earned. I am of opinion that this ingenious argument fails, because it is not proved that the defender was a party to the joint adventure. Participation in a joint adventure is not to be inferred from the bare fact of part ownership in the vessel, although ownership is an important element in the question—(Bell's Pr., section 392). In the present case there are no facts and circumstances, apart from the undisclosed purchase, to instruct participation, because I cannot read the somewhat unfortunate expression in the minute of admissions, that the defender assumed the rights of ownership, as meaning that he interfered in the equipment or management of the 'Arran.' It is not alleged that he did so, and in their reclaiming petition the pursuers fairly rest their case on the admitted part ownership (the only fact alleged in the condescendence), and not upon a judaical construction of that expression. It is quite clear that the repairs and furnishings made before the vessel sailed were not made or paid for upon the defender's credit; because the 'Arran' sailed before or just at the date of the purchase. It is not even alleged that the defender knew of the charter-party; and he seems to have been content to keep the bill of sale unregistered in security for the sum which he had paid for Hendry. Much stress is laid by the pursuers upon the following passage in MacLachlan on Shipping (3d ed. p. 106):—'On the other hand, it is the recognised rule of the law to charge the assignee or purchaser with the outfit and other expenses incurred, in respect of the voyage of which he is entitled by his purchase to share the profits; and as that can only be the voyage in prosecution at the time of the purchase, he is under no liability for the expense of an antecedent adventure, in respect of which he has no claim.'

"Now it appears to me that this passage, when examined in the light of the authorities referred to, means no more than this, that when an assignee or purchaser either claims freight, or is proved to have otherwise actively participated in or adopted the joint adventure or charter-party current at the date of his purchase, he is liable in an accounting with his co-owners to be charged with his proportion of the outfit and expenses referable to the voyage in question. If it had been proved in the present case that the defender knew of, and adopted the current charter-party, I should probably have held that he was liable for the antecedent expenses. It may be that comparatively slight evidence would have been sufficient in addition to the evidence of ownership. But without such proof, I am not prepared, in the absence of express authority, to subject the defender to liability for expenses which undoubtedly were not incurred on his credit or responsibility."

¹ Abbot on Shipping, 12th ed., p. 350; MacLachlan on Shipping, p. 105; Maude and Pollock on Shipping, i. 54; Stewart v. Greenock Marine Assurance Co., Jan. 13, 1846, 8 D. 323, 18 Scot. Jur. 151, aff. Sept. 1, 1848, 2 Clark (H. L.) 159; Green v. Briggs, April 12, 1847, 6 Hare's Chancery Reports, 395.

necessary to prepare the vessel for earning that in which, if earned, No. 168. the purchaser would share, and the pursuers as managing owners, who could have deducted the defender's share of them from freight, were entitled to sue him for it. The opinions of the text writers did not appear to depend on the actual earning of freight. The case of the "Aneroid" quoted by the Sheriff-substitute was not one between the managing owners and the purchaser of a share during the voyage. The cases quoted by the Sheriff were cases in which tradesmen sued for goods furnished to the ship; they had recourse only against those who had contracted with them. The present case also was different from Logan v. Brown,¹ because that was a case of joint adventure, and there was a like answer to the case of Nelmes.² The bill of sale as soon as it was executed and delivered on 5th December 1885 made the defender proprietor of shares in the ship with all the liabilities and rights belonging to that position, without need of intimation or possession.³ Possession was not an essential element in the judgment in Watson's case.⁴

Argued for the defender;—The defender did not employ the persons who executed the repairs and made the furnishings before he bought his interest in the ship. He bought a share in a ship ready fitted for sea. He knew nothing of the charter-party, if that was material. It was true that freight—that was, nett freight—belonged to the owner, including an owner who bought during the voyage, and the pursuer could deduct all expenses in fitting the ship to earn it. But it was another thing to say he had an action against the co-owner when no freight had been earned. Here no freight had been earned, and therefore no right to it could have been transferred.⁵ In all the cases cited on the other side there had been freight to be divided. If a ship's-husband was dismissed during the voyage his assignee had no claim to freight, because it was not earned till the voyage was completed.⁶ In a partnership, as the case of *Nelmes*⁷ shewed, an incoming partner was not liable for debts incurred before he became such.

At advising,—

LORD PRESIDENT.—This case was decided in the Sheriff Court of Renfrewshire on the pleadings and on a minute of admissions which I agree with the Sheriff is not very satisfactory in its language.

The vessel "Arran" was, prior to 5th December 1885, owned by two joint owners, Carswell, who had 42/64th shares, and Hendry, who had the remaining 22/64th shares. That was the state of the title to the vessel at that date. On 5th December 1885 a bill of sale was executed by Hendry, selling his 22/64th shares to Finlay the defender, and it is stated in the minute of admissions that "the defender admits that he became owner and assumed the rights of ownership on the 5th day of December 1885, the date of the bill of sale." It is not explained what is meant by the expression "assumed the rights of ownership,"

¹ May 15, 1824, 3 Shaw, 15.

² June 15, 1883, 10 R. 974.

³ Watson v. Duncan, July 12, 1879, 6 R. 1247.

⁴ The "Spirit of the Ocean," 34 L. J. Adm. 74.

⁵ Sea Insurance Co. v. Hadden & Wainwright, March 13, 1884, L. R., 13 Q. B. Div. 706; Splidt v. Bowlls, Nov. 11, 1808, 10 East, 279; Watson v. Duncan, 34 L. J. Adm. 74; Hickie v. Rodocanachi, May 11, 1859, 28 L. J. Ex. 273; Thomson v. Rowcroft, June 14, 1804, 4 East, 34.

⁶ MacLachlan on Shipping, p. 184.

⁷ June 15, 1883, 10 R. 974.

No. 168. and in that state of matters I take it that it means nothing and adds nothing to the statement that the defender "became owner."

July 8, 1887.

Carswell &

Son v. Finlay.

The bill of sale remained undisclosed and unintimated in the defender's hands, nor was any alteration made in the register, and though, being a bill of sale in the statutory form, it transferred the right of the seller to the purchaser, it does not appear that anything followed upon it. It is not proved, or even alleged, that it was intimated to the co-owner, or that the defender concerned himself with the condition of the vessel or her engagements. In short, it is plain on the state of the averments that the bill of sale was in reality nothing but a security for debt.

It so happened that the vessel was at the date of the bill of sale on the point of proceeding to Mobile under a charter-party, by which she was to proceed to that port and ship a cargo of timber for a home port. She sailed on that voyage on the same day as the bill of sale was made and delivered. She was lost on the homeward voyage, and in consequence earned no freight.

In these circumstances the defender's co-owner, Carswell, who was also the managing owner of the vessel, brings this action to recover the expenses of repairing and fitting out the vessel for that last voyage, on which she was lost. The accounts are divided into three parts, one part, A, being "a list of debts incurred and paid for wages and other disbursements of ship after the date of the bill of sale." To that part of the account the defender states no objection. He is willing to bear his share of that expenditure as expenditure falling upon him as a co-owner of the vessel after he became such. The other two branches of the accounts (B and C) are both accounts of expenditure made before the date of the bill of sale, B being an account for wages and disbursements before that date, and C being for repairs before that date. It is said that the defender is liable for these accounts as the cost of fitting out and furnishing the vessel for the voyage on which she was lost. The defender resists that demand, because these debts were incurred by the owners of the vessel before he became an owner, and he was not the employer of the persons who furnished the labour, materials, and stores to the vessel, the cost of which it is claimed that he must share. The pursuers' argument seems to resolve itself into this. If this vessel had under the charter-party earned freight, the defender would have been entitled to share as a joint owner therein, and therefore he must be liable in all expenses necessary to fit out the vessel to earn that freight. That seems plausible, but when the argument is examined it will be found to be unsound. It is no doubt quite true that if the ship had earned freight and returned safely to this country the defender, as a co-owner, would have been entitled to his share of the nett freight. The expenditure which he is now sued for would have been deducted from the gross freight earned, and the defender, as a co-owner, would have been entitled to a share of the nett freight on the ground that when it was earned he was one of the co-owners of the vessel.

But when he purchased the shares of the vessel on 5th December 1885 she was fitted out and already in a condition to go on the voyage by which freight was to be earned. What, therefore, he acquired was a right to 22/64th shares in a vessel which was prepared to start on a voyage, manned, equipped, and fully provisioned, and in good repair. What was sold to him was not a vessel which was going to be put into repair and fitted for a voyage, but a vessel already in that condition. After he became owner there was no occasion to employ anyone to repair or fit it out, that being already done by the seller and he pursuers as co-owners. The defender therefore got all the advantage of what had already been done. I think the managing owner or ship's-husband has no action against him for the cost of these repairs and fittings, on the simple ground that he was not the employer. The employment in respect of which the managing owner or ship's-husband must sue was that of the co-owners as they stood before the bill of sale. They were the only employers.

No. 168.

July 8, 1887.
Carswell &
Son v. Finlay.

LORD MURK.—I am of the same opinion. For it appears to me that upon the facts, which have been clearly explained by your Lordship, no claim can be made good against the defender except as to that part of the expenditure which was incurred subsequent to the date of the bill of sale. That view is clearly indicated as the rule of law applicable to such a case in the passage from the opinion of Sir Robert Phillimore which is quoted in the note of the Sheriff-substitute. The ship was here repaired and fitted out for the voyage before the sale, and it must be presumed that the defender gave full value for his shares in the ship as so fitted and repaired. The pursuer's claim therefore, as made, must, I think, be rejected. At first I had a little difficulty as to some of the larger items in account B, because they are items for expenditure made on the very eve of the sale for stores and provisions to be used during the voyage, and I thought it might be equitable that the defender should pay a share of these expenses. But on further consideration I am satisfied that they must follow the same rule as the other expenditure prior to the date of the bill of sale.

LORD SHAND.—The advances in question were not made on the credit of the defender, nor were they made, nor was the obligation to pay them incurred, at any time during the period when he was a part owner. In that state of the fact it is plain, that unless special grounds are shewn to establish the supervening liability said to have been undertaken by him for payment, he cannot be made liable. Now, on the record and the minute of admissions one fact, and one only, is relied upon,—that is, that the defender became owner of 22/64th shares in the vessel on 5th December 1885, just at the time when she sailed; or was about to sail, under the charter-party of 11th November previous. The minute of admissions goes further in expression than a mere statement that the defender became a co-owner, for it goes on to say that he “assumed the rights of ownership” on that date, but after pressing counsel on both sides as to whether any additional meaning was to be derived from this expression, I was left in the same state of mind which your Lordship has expressed—that of thinking that the expression has no substantial meaning beyond the statement that the defender became a co-owner.

In that state of matters there are, I think, no sufficient general grounds for holding that there was any liability undertaken by the defender for the expenditure sued for. He did not authorise it or become responsible, unless the mere fact of his becoming a co-owner made him so. Now, so far as can be seen, this bill of sale was kept entirely latent. It was a transaction between the defender and Hendry, the person who executed it, but it was not intimated and not registered, and the parties who entered into it might have put it into the fire a week or a month afterwards if they had chosen. It was never acted on, and no one else had any right under it. I see no ground on which we can hold that the defender became responsible by merely taking the bill of sale.

No. 168. I further agree that even if intimation of the bill of sale had been made to the ship's-husband and the co-owners, the result of the facts and the admissions would have been the same. When the defender acquired his shares it was not specially stipulated that he should undertake liability for furnishings and repairs already made, and so he bought a share in a ship which was victualled, provisioned, and ready for sea as between him and the person who sold to him, and in that state of fact there is no ground for holding that he became responsible to the ship's-husband. It is quite true that if freight had been earned the ship's-husband would have been entitled to retain even against the defender the advances he had made to enable it to be earned. That follows from the relation of the ship's-husband to the ship, and those on whose credit he made the advances, and the right arises from the doctrine of retention. He would retain against the ship what he had paid out for the ship. But that is a different thing from the assertion of an active right to sue the defender personally, and recover from him as personally responsible for them, advances made before he had anything to do with the ship. In the state of matters which has actually occurred there is no freight. What remedy, then, has the ship's-husband? Plainly his remedy is to have recourse against the former proprietor of the defender's shares for the proportion due in respect of these shares, and that because it was on his credit and employment that the liability was undertaken. But has he also a remedy against the person who became a co-owner? There is no averment as to a custom of trade to the effect that in such a case as the present the liability of the person to whom the ship, or part of it, belonged when the repairs were made attaches also to the person who buys his shares after the work is done; and even if there were, I should question much whether any effect could be given to such a custom. But there is no such averment, and I see no ground for imposing such a liability. Even if the pursuers had recovered or retained such sums as are here sued for from the defender out of freight received, the latter would have been entitled to recover what he so paid from the vendor of the shares to him. But this is not a case in which there is responsibility and a right of relief only. I think the case fails at the outset. There is no legal ground for making the defender responsible at all. I therefore agree with your Lordship.

LORD ADAM was absent on Circuit.

THE COURT pronounced this interlocutor:—"Refuse the appeal, adhere to the interlocutors of the Sheriffs complained of, and decern: Find the appellants (pursuers) liable to the respondent (defender) in expenses in this Court: Allow an account thereof to be lodged, and remit the same to the Auditor to tax, and also the expenses found due in the Sheriff Court, and to report."

W. B. RAINNIE, S.S.C.—J. SMITH CLARK, S.S.C.—Agents.

No. 169. TRADES' HOUSE OF GLASGOW AND OTHERS, Pursuers (Reclaimers).—

Gloag—Murray.

July 8, 1887. HERITORS OF GOVAN PARISH, Defenders (Respondents).—D.-F. Mackintosh
—J. M. Black.

Church—Heritors—Liability for repairs—Cess-roll of valued rent—Ecclesiastical Buildings (Scotland) Act, 1868 (31 and 32 Vict. c. 96), sec. 23.—The 23d section of the Ecclesiastical Buildings (Scotland) Act, 1868, enacts that "when the area of any parish church heretofore erected has been allocated among the heritors according to their respective valued rents, all assessments for the repair thereof shall be imposed on such heritors according to such valued rent." No. 169.

July 8, 1887.
Trades' House
of Glasgow v.
Heritors of
Govan Parish.
In 1826 the seats in a parish church were allocated among the heritors according to their valued rents. In 1857 one of the heritors had become divested of the dominium utile of his whole lands in the parish (with the exception of the minerals), but his name remained as before on the Cess-roll of valued rent. The heritors having on various occasions after that date imposed assessments upon him for repairs of the church, in 1886 he raised an action against the heritors for declarator that he was not liable for any assessments imposed after 1857, on the ground that after that date he was no longer a heritor in the parish. Held that the heritors were bound to assess according to the Cess-roll, and had no power to alter it.

Observed that the pursuer's remedy was to apply to the Commissioners of Supply to have the roll altered, and the names of the feuars, with the proportionate part of the rent allocated upon each, entered.

Church—Heritors—Objections to validity of assessments.—When a heritor has objections to the legality of an assessment imposed on him by the heritors of his parish they must be stated tempestive, and not after the lapse of years.

THE TRADES' HOUSE OF GLASGOW were proprietors of certain sub-1st Division.
Ld. M'Laren.
M.
jects in Gorbals and Bridgend, Glasgow, which came to be known as "Tradeston," in the parish of Govan. In 1791 they began to feu out these subjects for building purposes, and they continued to do so till the year 1856, when the last remaining plot of ground was feued, and they became entirely divested of the dominium utile of the subjects. Under the feu-rights thus granted the feuars were taken bound, inter alia, to free the Trades' House of a proportional part of all public and parish burdens payable out of the lands. The Trades' House reserved the coal, metals, and minerals in the lands.

The name of the Trades' House had long been, and still was at the date of this action, upon the Cess-roll of the county of Lanark, and that being so, the heritors of Govan parish had levied upon them, as one of the heritors of the parish, certain assessments in respect of repairs effected on the parish church, manse, and churchyard. These assessments had all been paid down to June 1873.

In 1886 the Trades' House brought this action of declarator against the heritors of the parish, and their clerk and collector as representing them, to have it found that they were not liable to pay any assessments imposed subsequently to 1st January 1857 and still remaining unpaid, and in particular those imposed on and after 9th June 1873. They further called upon the defenders to rectify their rolls and books accordingly.

Their contention was that these assessments were leviable only from those who owned the dominium utile in lands within the parish, and that their rights had, in the knowledge of the defenders, been limited to the dominium directum since 1856. Since that date, or at least since June 1873, they stated that they had exercised none of the rights attaching to heritors.

The defenders stated that the assessments in question had all been evied according to the valued rent, as appearing on the Cess-roll, and that the pursuers had allowed them to be made without challenge, although they had due notice of all the meetings of the heritors. They further explained that it was outwith their power to alter their roll so long as the pursuers' name was entered on the Cess-roll, and that the pursuers' remedy was to apply to the Commissioners of Supply to have their name removed from the roll.

The pursuers pleaded, inter alia;—(1) The pursuers' rights, as proprietors in trust foresaid, in the subjects described in the summons being

No. 169.
 July 8, 1887.
 Trades' House
 of Glasgow v.
 Heritors of
 Govan Parish.

limited to the dominium directum or superiority thereof, and having been so limited since the 1st day of January 1857, they are entitled to decree of declarator as concluded for. (3) In any view, the assessments in question were illegally imposed according to the valued rent, and ought to have been imposed according to the real rent, as set forth in the valuation-rolls, and the pursuers, not being entered in said valuation-rolls, are not liable for any assessment.

The defenders pleaded, inter alia;—(2) The pursuers being heritors in the parish of Govan, and appearing as such in the old valuation or Cess-roll of the county of Lanark, are liable for all assessments leviable upon the heritors, according to the valued rent. (4) In any event, the said assessments having been imposed and levied after due notice, and the pursuers having taken no steps to bring the said assessments under review, they are now barred from challenging the said assessments.

A joint minute of admissions was put in for the parties in which the pursuers admitted,—“(1) That the ecclesiastical buildings of Govan were built by the valued rent heritors of the parish, and that the seats in the parish church (demolished in 1884) were, in 1826, allocated according to the valued rent, and that the pursuers, as such heritors, had certain seats in the church allotted to them, for which they received rent down to the year 1857, and one single payment in the year 1869 . . . (3) That the pursuers have long been, and still are, entered on the Cess-roll of the county of Lanark, that they have regularly paid and still continue to pay, cess or land-tax, and that they, on two occasions, applied by petition to the Commissioners of Supply of said county in order to have their name removed from said roll, and that, in each case, their application was refused. (4) That the method of assessment for repairs on church, manse, &c., in the parish of Govan has, from time immemorial, been according to the valued rent, and that at no time was an assessment ever levied according to the real rent. (5) That the various meetings of heritors held between 1872 and 1886 were duly convened by notice read in the parish church and advertisements in a public newspaper. That in the year 1870, the pursuers, in a letter to the defenders, denied their liability for assessments for repairs on church, manse, &c., but that in an action raised in 1871 . . . by the present defenders, decree was granted by the Sheriff against the present pursuers in respect of such assessments, which were thereupon paid. That, since the date of said decree, the pursuers have taken no steps to have their immunity from assessment established, further than asserting that they were not liable, . . . and also refusing payment of their share of the assessments, referred to in the summons, when the same was demanded. (6) That the assessments mentioned in the summons were none of them applicable to the building of the new parish church, which was erected subsequent to the year 1884, by subscription, under arrangement with the heritors.”

Proof was also led, the result of which was that the Trades' House officials denied that they had ever received notice of assessments, while on the other hand there was evidence that the notices had been sent out by the defenders. It was however admitted that since 1869 the pursuers had not attended any meeting of heritors.

The Lord Ordinary (M'Laren), on 16th February 1887, assolizied the defenders.*

* “OPINION.—The question in this case is whether the Trades' House of Glasgow are liable, in the capacity of heritors or otherwise, for a proportion of the assessments levied since the year 1872 for repairing the parish church, manse,

The pursuers reclaimed, and argued;—1. The Lord Ordinary had to some extent been influenced by the argument which was based upon mora, No. 169.

July 8, 1887.

churchyard, and walls. The pursuers were formerly proprietors of the estate described in the summons, but before the period embraced by this action they had feued out everything they possessed in the parish, excepting their seat in the parish church. This also they have eventually got out of, but only through the demolition of the building of which it formed a part. It is stated in a joint minute for the parties that the old ecclesiastical buildings of Govan were built at the cost of the valued rent heritors, and it is further stated that the seats in the parish church (demolished in 1884) were in 1826 allocated according to the valued rent, and that the pursuers, as heritors of lands having a valued rental, had certain seats allotted to those which they had a right to occupy.

Trades' House
of Glasgow v.
Heritors of
Govan Parish.

"It is admitted, or is in any case a necessary inference from the admitted facts, that the Trades Corporation, before they feued their lands, were rightly placed on the roll of valued rental, by the Commissioners of Supply for the county of Lanark. It may be taken for granted that the pursuers are entitled to have their names taken off the roll of valued rent, by going through certain forms involving the consent of the feuars, amongst whom the land-tax is to be divided, or an adjudication against them. In the meantime the pursuers as a corporation are on the roll, and they have regularly paid their land-tax, for which they have a claim of rateable relief against their tenants in the various feu-holdings.

"With respect to so much of the assessments in dispute as applies to repairs on the fabric of the church, I have to consider the effect of the 33d section of 17 and 18 Vict. cap. 91, and of the 23d section of 31 and 32 Vict. cap. 96 (The Ecclesiastical Buildings Act), which provide that where the area of a church heretofore erected has been allocated amongst the heritors according to their respective valued rents, all assessments for repairs shall be imposed according to the valued rents.

"These enactments would, on a first impression, appear to be decisive of the question, so far at least as relates to the repair of the church. But they are not necessarily so; because the pursuers, while admitting the applicability of the statutes, contend that they themselves are not, in a legal sense, the true valued rent heritors; and that it is the business of the body of heritors to find out who the feuars are, and to make a division of the valued rent affecting their properties, for the purposes of the several assessments which they have laid on.

"This appears to me to be one of those propositions which contains in itself the elements of its own dissolution. How, or by what authority, are the heritors of Govan to divide the valued rent amongst the feuars? Where an assessment is laid on real rental, or on any fixed proportion of real rental, the extent of the liability is a mere question of fact, and can be ascertained like any other fact. Accordingly in the cases of disputed liability to assessment for the poor, which occurred before the passing of the General Lands Valuation Act, the Court had no difficulty in inquiring into the question of value for the purposes of the particular assessment.

"But, as it appears to me, valued rental is not a thing which can be ascertained or divided except by the Commissioners of Supply, or in an action to which they and the feuars are parties. It is not a valuation at all (except in a historical sense), but is a fixed and constant scale according to which the land-tax is to be levied from the persons whose names are on the roll as representing certain ancient estates. Where superior and feuar are agreed, the Commissioners have authority to substitute the feuar for the superior. Where they are not agreed resort must be had to a Court of law, by whose order the necessary substitution made be made. Until the proper correction is applied to the roll of valued rent, or county Cess-roll, as it is termed, it appears to me that the heritors have no other person liable to them for such ecclesiastical expenses as are burdens on the valued rent than the person or corporation whose name appears in the roll. Valued rent being a thing wholly factitious as a criterion of liability, it can neither be made nor unmade except in the regular legal manner. The pursuers have been unable (as appears from the papers) to obtain

No. 169.

July 8, 1887.
Trades' House
of Glasgow v.
Heritors of Govan Parish.

but the pursuers had always maintained the ground that they were not liable and could not now be held to be barred merely because they had not previously brought a declarator.

2. It was true the pursuers were mineral owners, but it was settled law that mineral owners were not "heritors" so as to be liable for parochial assessments.¹ The reasons for the decision in the case of Bell would have been the same whether the Act 1681, cap. 108 (Thomson's Acts, viii., p. 363), declaring that coal and salt should not bear any part of the supply, had passed or not. Therefore the pursuers were not liable as mineral owners, and they were not liable as superiors.² But it was said that they must pay because they were entered as proprietors on the Cess-roll. That was a question of law. The assessment was imposed under the 23d section of the Ecclesiastical Buildings Act, 1868. But that Act imposed no assessment which was not imposed before. Heritors were a quasi-corporation and a majority bound them.³ But they could only assess themselves and no one else. The question, therefore, was what was the test of being the consent of their feuars to the substitution of their names in the county Cess-roll; and as they have not brought an action to have the roll amended, I am of opinion that they are liable to be assessed just as if they were the true heritors. If they have relief under their feu-contracts, this of course can be enforced in another way.

"There remains the question of liability for the repair of the manse and the churchyard walls. There can be no separate question of general importance with reference to repayment of expenditure for keeping this property in order. If the assessment was rightly imposed on the valued rent, then the decision of this question and that of the repairs to the church is one and the same. But if the assessment was wrongly imposed on the valued rent, then I am of opinion that the Trades' House of Glasgow has not taken the proper and necessary proceedings for correcting the illegality. A ratepayer who intends to challenge an assessment upon objections, which, if sustained, would nullify the whole assessment, must meet his antagonists fairly, and promptly. If the objection had been taken immediately on the imposition of any of the rates in dispute, and had been confined to that particular rate, we should have considered it. But it appears to me that I should be taking a departure in a direction opposed to the equitable considerations which have guided the practice of this Court were I to give any countenance to an objection which would invalidate all the payments that have been made within the last fourteen years, and would impose upon trustees, and other representative persons, the obligation of suing for repayment of local taxation, contributed and expended in good faith during all that time by a body of persons who believed that they were liable to contribute to these public objects. It is right to say that the officers of the Trades' House deny the receipt of the notices of assessment, and they may therefore conceive that they were not called on to take proceedings for the suspension of the assessment. But they do not deny that they were in the knowledge that the assessments were being laid on; and it is quite competent to suspend upon the apprehension of a threatened charge. The posting of the notices of assessment was proved in the usual way, and I must hold that notice was duly given.

"In all the circumstances, I am not able to give effect to any of the conclusions of the summons; and I shall find that the condescendence is not proved, and assolvie the defenders from the conclusions of the summons, finding them also entitled to their expenses."

¹ Bell v. Lord Wemyss, Feb. 16, 1805, M. App. voce Kirk, 3; Connell's Parochial Law Supplement, pp. 28 and 29; Dunlop's Parochial Law, 9; Duncan's Parochial Ecclesiastical Law, 168; Bell's Principles, 1164 (note).

² Bell's Principles, 1171; Dundas, 1778, M. 8551; Robertson v. Murdoch, Feb. 23, 1830, 8 S. 587; Traquair's Trustees v. Heritors of Innerleithen, Dec. 9, 1870, 9 Macph. 234, 43 Scot. Jur. 121.

³ Boswell v. Duke of Portland, Dec. 9, 1834, 13 S. 148.

heritor. It was not the fact of being on a particular roll. The case of No. 169.
the Commissioners of Edinburghshire,¹ cited on the other side, shewed that the Cess-roll was not conclusive upon the question of who were heritors. Nor was the Valuation-roll conclusive,²—much less the valued rent roll, which might even bear less relationship to the actual ownership than the Valuation-roll. Besides, unworked mines, which was the only subject now belonging to the reclaimers, might not competently be entered in the Valuation-roll unless worked to profit during the year of assessment (Valuation Act, 1854, sec. 42). By the interpretation clause (sec.
1) of the Ecclesiastical Buildings (Scotland) Act, 1868, heritor was defined as meaning “any proprietor of lands and heritages at present liable in the assessments which may be imposed according to the real or valued rents thereof.” The heritors might assess themselves on the real or valued rent, but there was no such thing as a simply “valued rent heritor.” They might assess for church repairs on the valued rent, and for the manse on the real rent. No decision conflicted with that argument. The case of the *Duke of Abercorn*³ was not an assessment by heritors, but by the presbytery, who left the heritors to divide the assessment as they chose.
The judgment would have been different if the assessment had been by the heritors.

July 8, 1887.
Trades' House
of Glasgow v.
Heritors of Govan Pariah.

3. Assuming that the reclaimers were wrong in the proposition that, not being heritors, they were not liable, the assessment for all parochial purposes, with the exception of church repairs (which were regulated by the 23d section of the Ecclesiastical Buildings Act, 1868), was upon the real rent. When the Act of 1663, cap. 21, dealing with the building and repairing of churches, manses, &c., was passed, the Valuation-roll did not exist. It only came into existence in 1667. It was suggested in the Kinclaven case⁴ that the assessment was optional, but that was only in landward cases.⁵ Accordingly, the Court ought to sustain the third plea for the reclaimers, except as regards the church repairs:

4. Application had been made to the Commissioners of Supply to have the roll rectified, and the feuars placed upon it, but the difficulty was that the feuars—being very numerous—did not appear, and the Commissioners had no power to cite them.

The respondents argued;—1. They were valued rent heritors, because they were on the Cess-roll, and the feuars were not. The question was whether the pursuers could get behind that roll. It was immaterial to what extent the land had been feued out, so long as they remained on the roll.⁶ There was no injustice in holding that the roll ruled so long as those complaining of the assessment did not go to the Commissioners of Supply to have it altered. If the Commissioners refused to alter, a remedy was open by appeal to the Court of Session.⁷ The collector to the heritors had no title to go to the Commissioners.¹ There were no doubt cases where the Cess-roll was not conclusive for all purposes, e.g., voting, but it

¹ Lord Advocate v. Commissioners of Supply of Edinburghshire, 23 D. 933; Erskine's Inst. ii. 10, 63.

² M'Laren v. Clyde Trustees, and M'Laren v. Harvey, Nov. 17, 1865, 4 Macph. 58, affd. 6 Macph. (H. of L.) 81; Toshack v. Smart, July 18, 1771, M. 13,134.

³ 8 Macph. 733.

⁴ Highland Railway Company v. Heritors of Kinclaven, June 15, 1870, 8 Macph. 858, 42 Scot. Jur. 487; Downie v. M'Lean, Oct. 26, 1883, 11 R. 47.

⁵ The Feuars of Peterhead, June 24, 1802, 4 Pat. Appa. 356.

⁶ Feuars of Peterhead, 4 Pat. Appa. 356; Duke of Abercorn, &c. v. Presbytery of Edinburgh, March 17, 1870, 8 Macph. 733, 42 Scot. Jur. 377.

⁷ Wight's Treatise, p. 148, et seq.; Wight's Inquiry, p. 159, et seq.

No. 169. was always conclusive as to who the heritors were. 2. In addition to the fact that the pursuers were on the roll here there were the two facts (1) that they were superiors, and it had never been decided that where they remained on the roll as such their position as heritors changed, and (2) they were mineral proprietors. It was said that the case of *Bell*¹ was an authority to the effect that mineral proprietors fell to be exempted from parochial assessments. The decision in that case did not appear to proceed altogether upon the Statute of 1681, but on the fact that mineral estate was of a very casual and varying value. If it proceeded on the statute the case was not in point, because coal and salt works alone were exempted. Further, the Valuation Act, 1854, contemplated the continued liability of mine-owners,—if on the latter ground, it did not apply to a question of repairs, which this was. The pursuers here were in the same position as the Duke of Abercorn² in his case, where it was held that valued rent heritors using the church or retaining seats were liable for rebuilding and repair assessment. Further, so long as the pursuers held seats in the church they retained their character of heritors, although they might have disposed of the dominium utile of the subjects belonging to them. 3. The assessments for repairs on the church were rightly imposed according to the valued rent in terms of the 23d section of the Ecclesiastical Buildings Act. It was said that in 1663, when the Act dealing with the building of churches, manse, &c., was enacted, the Valuation-roll did not exist. But it had been originally introduced in 1643, and although it was in abeyance for a time, it was revived in 1667.³ 4. The assessments for repairs on the manse and churchyard were on the same footing as repairs on the church. The terms of the 23d section of the Ecclesiastical Buildings Act, 1868, were not against this view, and the considerations applicable to the two cases of the church and manse could not be distinguished from one another.⁴ The churchyard must be regarded as an accessory to the church (Duncan, 247). Further, it would be absurd to have two different rolls. 5. The delay in raising this question was very material. It was conclusive in poor-law cases, where the ratepayers changed, and injustice could not be redressed.

At advising,—

LORD PRESIDENT.—The Trades' House of Glasgow have been for a long time the proprietors of an extensive piece of ground which now constitutes the Tradeston district of Glasgow. The district is now entirely covered with buildings. They were formerly the sole owners, but the ground was feued out in different portions throughout a long course of years until in the year 1856 the last feu in their hands was given out. In the interval their name has remained upon the Cess-roll of the county of Lanark, and they have continued to pay land-tax for the whole ground which has been feued off. They are still the sole representatives upon the Cess-roll of what may be called the valued rent of this portion of the county of Lanark.

The object of the present action is to have it found that in consequence of the fact that the Trades' House have ceased to be proprietors of the dominium utile, or of any part of it, they are no longer liable to pay any part of the

¹ M. Appendix, voce Kirk, 3.

² Duke of Abercorn, &c. v. Presbytery of Edinburgh, March 17, 1870, 8 Macph. 733, 42 Scot. Jur. 377.

³ Rankine on Landownership, 192.

⁴ Duncan's Parochial Law, p. 466; Heritors of Olrig v. Phin, July 10, 1851. 13 D. 1335; Highland Railway Co. v. Heritors of Kinclaven, June 15, 1870. 8 Macph. 858.

assessments for ecclesiastical buildings in the parish of Govan. The argument is that they have ceased to be heritors, and, as heritors only are liable for such assessments, that they cannot be liable. That is a very plausible argument, but I am afraid there are many difficulties in the way of its being accepted.

No. 169.
July 8, 1887.
Trades' House
of Glasgow v.
Heritors of
Govan Parish.

In the first place, it is to be observed that one of the taxes to which exception is taken is the assessment for the purpose of repairing the parish church—not the existing church, which was erected in 1884,—but the old parish church, which was in existence previously. There is no doubt, as regards it, that it was maintained throughout by assessments on the valued rent, and that the division of the area was made according to the valued rent of the different heritors in the parish, and accordingly the Trades' House had sittings allotted to them according to their proportion of the valued rent. In this state of the facts the provision in the 23d section of the Ecclesiastical Buildings Act seems to me directly to apply. It provides that “when the area of any parish church heretofore erected has been allocated among the heritors according to their respective valued rents, all assessments for the repairs thereof shall be imposed on such heritors according to such valued rent.” If the Trades' House are still heritors of the parish, that section is conclusive of the whole question, but the contention is that they have ceased to be heritors, and only hold now a bare right of superiority.

But this practical difficulty at once arises. We are bound to see that this assessment is raised and allocated according to the respective valued rents. And the clerk to the heritors is also similarly bound. And there is no one who has any valued rent on the Cess-roll in respect of this property except the Trades' House of Glasgow. The cumulo valuation of the Trades' House has never been divided, and accordingly they stand upon the Cess-roll as representing the whole of the valued rent of the property which has been feued out. They say they have ceased to be heritors, but they ought to have taken care that others were put in their place. Their remedy was a very simple one. They had only to apply to the Commissioners of Supply to divide and allocate among their feuars that portion of the valued rent for which they were entered on the Cess-roll. If they have failed to do this, or have attempted it so imperfectly that it has not been done, it is their own fault. Neither the collector nor anyone else can do this for them, and no means exist whereby it can be done except those I have pointed out. If they have any difficulty in carrying this matter through, and the Commissioners of Supply do not fulfil their duty, then it can be brought up here, and by that simple process they can relieve themselves of liability. But so long as they remain upon the Cess-roll and pay the whole of the land-tax I do not see how they can claim to be relieved. So far, therefore, as regards the question relating to the repairs upon the church, I agree with the Lord Ordinary.

As regards the other assessments, I also adopt the reasoning of the Lord Ordinary. His Lordship says that if there be a question whether the assessment ought to have been laid upon real or upon valued rent, it ought to have been raised at once when the assessment was made; that it will not do to lie by and allow the assessments to accumulate, and then to bring an action for declarator that they never ought to have been demanded, and that they were not justly due. If an objection is to be taken, it must be taken at the time, otherwise it would involve a readjustment of the whole accounts of the heritors for years gone by.

On the whole matter I am for adhering to the Lord Ordinary's interlocutor.

No. 169. LORD MURE.—I am of the same opinion. The valued rent of the heritors whose names appear upon the Cess-roll is the fund upon which, in the ordinary case, the liability for assessment for the erection and upholding of ecclesiastical buildings falls. The assessment is made upon the persons whose names appear on that roll, and they pay that assessment as well as some other taxes in respect of their names being there. They, however, say that their names ought not to be there, because they have parted with the dominium utile of the property. That may be so, but then it rests with them to see that proper steps are taken to have their names removed. Because, so long as their names remain upon the roll, they cannot disclaim responsibility for assessment. Upon that ground I concur with your Lordship in holding that the Lord Ordinary has come to a right conclusion.

July 8, 1887.
Trades' House
of Glasgow v.
Heritors of
Govan Parish.

LORD SHAND.—I am quite of the same opinion, and while I concur with your Lordship in the chair in what you have said, I may add that I adopt the whole grounds of judgment which have been stated by the Lord Ordinary. The argument which was presented for the reclaimers, if applied to the case of a superior who was gradually giving off a number of feus, would amount to this, that the collector of assessments for the heritors would have to proceed by dividing the amount of the valued rent, year after year, between the superior and, it might be, a large number of feuars, and thereafter levy the assessment. I can only say that if any assessor were to attempt anything of the kind he would at once find himself involved in very serious difficulty, and the heritors would be exposed to serious litigations as to each feu's share of the burdens, with no certain test to which an appeal could be made. That serious practical difficulty seems to me to go a long way towards the solution of the question before us.

In regard to the liability for repairs on the manse and churchyard walls, it appears to me that this branch of the question must follow the other. The heritors have made their assessment upon the valued rent, as they were entitled to do, and the decision of the first branch of the case applies also to this. But I further agree with the Lord Ordinary in the alternative view which he has taken, and I think that it is now too late to raise the question of liability for these repairs.

LORD ADAM was absent on Circuit.

THE COURT adhered.

J. & A. HASTIE, S.S.C.—RONALD & RITCHIE, S.S.C.—Agents.

No. 170.

ROBERT M'WHIRTER, Complainer (Reclaimer).—M'Kechnie—Forsyth
REVEREND JAMES RANKIN AND OTHERS (M'Culloch's Trustees), Respondents.—Murray—M'Clure.

July 9, 1887.
M'Whirter v.
M'Culloch's Trustees.

Right in security—Bond and disposition in security—Personal obligation—Sale.—The creditor in a bond and disposition in security in the form prescribed by the Titles to Land Consolidation Act, 1868, and containing the usual clause consenting to registration for execution, gave notice requiring payment of his loan along with the usual three months' premonition that failing payment he might proceed to sell. Immediately thereafter the creditor charged the debtor on the personal obligation contained in the bond. The debtor having brought a suspension of the charge, held that the creditor was entitled to both remedies, and note refused accordingly.

By bond and disposition in security dated 16th, and recorded 17th No. 170. February 1881, Robert M'Whirter borrowed £1000 from the Rev. J. M. M'Culloch, D.D., over certain subjects in Greenock. The bond was in terms of the form prescribed by "The Titles to Land Consolidation Act, 1868," and contained the usual clause consenting to registration for execution.

July 9, 1887.

M'Whirter v. M'Culloch's Trustees.

On 27th May 1887, Dr M'Culloch having died in the interval, his trustees gave notice requiring payment of the £1000 within the three months provided by the 119th section of the Titles to Land Act, 1868.

Bill-Chamber. 1st Division. Lord Trayner. M.

On 16th June following, and prior to the expiry of the three months, the trustees charged M'Whirter to pay the £1000 upon the personal obligation contained in the bond.

M'Whirter suspended, pleading, inter alia,—(3) The said charge is at variance with the terms of the schedule previously served on the complainer by the respondents in virtue of the statute, and also at variance with the provisions of the statute itself.

The respondents stated that there had been delay in paying the interest on the bond, and that they had learned that the value of the security had seriously depreciated, and that it would not be prudent to allow the loan to continue.

The Lord Ordinary (Trayner), on 15th June 1887, refused the note.*

The complainer reclaimed.

The respondents' counsel were not called on.

LORD PRESIDENT.—This case is too clear for argument. Section 119 of the Titles to Land Consolidation Act, 1868, which has been appealed to, has really nothing to do with the question. Where the subject of the security is to be realised, the provisions of that section are to be followed, and the sale may take place upon three months' premonition. But there is no proposal to sell in the present case. The only matter before us is the ordinary charge upon a personal bond, which the suspender says should not be allowed to proceed, because the three months have not expired. But the bond gives two remedies,—the first, that of charging upon the personal obligation; the second, that of calling up the bond, and failing payment within three months, of proceeding to a sale of the security subjects. It cannot be doubted that the respondents were entitled to both remedies.

LORD MURE, LORD SHAND, and LORD ADAM concurred.

THE COURT adhered.

ROBERT EMSLIE, S.S.C.—SMITH & MASON, S.S.C.—Agents.

* "OPINION.—This suspension proceeds upon two grounds—(1) That the charge complained of is at variance with the provisions of the Titles to Land Consolidation Act, 1868; and (2) that the charge is oppressive.

"(1) The clauses of the Act referred to make provision for the proceedings which must be taken before the creditor in a heritable security takes steps to realise the subject of the security. But these clauses have no application in the present case, because the creditor is not proposing to sell the security subjects; but is proceeding only to recover his debt by diligence on the personal obligation of the suspender. This appears to me to be within the right of the respondent, and is a right, in my opinion, distinctly recognised by the effect given by statute to the clause in the bond consenting to registration for execution."

No. 171.

July 14, 1887.
Houldsworth
v. Burgh of Wishaw.

JAMES HOULDSWORTH, Pursuer (Respondent).—Murray—Ure.
COMMISSIONERS OF POLICE FOR THE BURGH OF WISHAW AND JOHN LOGAN (their Clerk), Defenders (Reclaimers).—Balfour—Darling—McKinn.

Property—Nuisance—Implied contract—Acquiescence.—The proprietor of an estate adjoining a town, part of which was built on land feued from him, constructed sewers so as to carry to his lands, for the purpose of irrigation, the sewage of that part of the town, and he made settling-ponds and other works on his estate for that purpose. In 1868 the Commissioners of Police of the town, which had adopted the General Police Act of 1862, executed drainage works, in doing which they took advantage of the proprietor's system of drainage, with his knowledge, connecting some of their drains with his sewers and settling-ponds. Thereafter the town increased, and the quantity of sewage drained towards the proprietor's lands was thus greatly augmented. The sewage irrigation became unsatisfactory and was abandoned. In 1886 the proprietor, in consequence of the nuisance caused by the quantity of sewage sent upon his lands, raised an action against the Commissioners, concluding for declarator that the town was not entitled to send sewage upon the pursuer's lands, and for interdict. Held (1) that no contract by which the proprietor was bound to receive the town sewage upon his lands could be implied from the actings of parties; and (2) that he could not, by having allowed the drainage system of the town to be made so as to join his own, without objection, be held to have acquiesced in their sending sewage upon his lands in time coming, and therefore that he was entitled to decree of declarator and interdict as craved.

2D DIVISION.
Lord Kinnear.
R.

BETWEEN 1856 and 1864 the late Henry Houldsworth of Coltness, who had feued part of that estate within the burgh of Wishaw, constructed sewers from these feus to discharge sewage for irrigation purposes upon his farms. In January 1868 Mr Houldsworth died, and was succeeded by his son, Mr James Houldsworth. In April 1868 the Commissioners of Police of the burgh, with Mr Houldsworth's knowledge, connected drains which they had formed with these sewers. The irrigation works were abandoned in 1874.

In November 1886 Mr Houldsworth raised an action against the Commissioners of Police for the burgh, acting under the General Police Act, 1862, and being the Local Authority under the Public Health Act, 1867, for declarator that the defenders were not entitled to emit or discharge from the sewers or pipes under their control any sewage or drainage matter on to or upon the pursuer's lands, and for interdict against their doing so.

The defenders, after setting forth the construction of sewers by the pursuer's predecessor and subsequently by themselves, averred,—“The Commissioners understood and believed, and the fact is, that the pursuer's predecessor had, by what he had done with respect to the drainage arrangements aforesaid, a vested interest in the sewage in the streets referred to, and as at the time when the Commissioners' sewers were being constructed, he was anxious to obtain the sewage for irrigation, they were not entitled to divert it from the destinations to which he had provided as aforesaid for its being conducted.” (Stat. 10) “The pursuer did not object to the discharge of the sewage until recently, and not until he thought that the irrigation of his lands by sewage did not benefit him. The only objection, however, which he stated prior to the raising of the present action was to the sewage which is discharged into Templehill Burn. The sewage in the districts which drain on to his lands has probably increased, but the increase, if any, has been caused wholly, or almost wholly, by the pursuer feuing or letting on long leases for building purposes his lands of Coltness in those parts of the burgh. If the sewage is now creating a nuisance, it was and is by the actings of the pursuer and his predecessor above-mentioned that the sewage has been, and is being, conducted on to his lands; and he and not the Commissioners are bound to remove any nuisance which may be thereby caused upon his lands. The whole system of draining under the control of the defenders was formed, and the necessary funds were borrowed, and the assessment imposed under the 'General Police and Improvement (Scotland) Act, 1862,' and not under 30 and 31 Vict. cap. 101."

No. 171.

July 14, 1887.
Houldsworth
v. Burgh of Wishaw.

The defenders pleaded;—(3) The defenders having a right to discharge the sewage of the burgh on to the pursuer's lands as set out in the defenders' statement, they ought to be assoilzied, with expenses. (4) The drainage arrangements whereby it is alleged that a nuisance is caused, having been made by the pursuer or his predecessor in the said lands and estate, or being in partial substitution for those made by him and them, as alleged in the defenders' statement, the action cannot be maintained.

At the close of the proof a new plea was added,—“The pursuer is barred from maintaining the present action, because (1) he and his predecessor in the lands of Coltness took part in setting up the sewage system of which he complains, acquiesced therein, and took benefit therefrom, and (2) the alleged nuisance is due to his own actings in disusing his irrigation works, and feuing or leasing his lands within the burgh.”

The facts of the case upon which this defence was founded are narrated in the following extract from the opinion of the Lord Ordinary, which was admitted at the debate to be a correct account thereof:—“It appears that before the passing of the Public Health Act, 1867, and before the adoption [in 1862] of the Police Act of 1862 by the burgh of Wishaw, the late Mr Henry Houldsworth, the father of the pursuer, had constructed sewers for carrying off the drainage of houses built on his property within the present boundaries of the burgh, and held on feu-rights or long leases under him. The sewage of these houses was discharged by the drains so constructed upon Mr Houldsworth's lands of Coltness, and many, although not all, of the leases contained clauses by which the tenant was taken bound to drain his lands and houses into the main sewer, if any, in the street or roadway in front, or to discharge his sewage at any point the proprietor might direct, and by which the proprietor, if he constructed the main drain, became entitled to the whole sewage thereby discharged. The defenders took advantage to a certain extent of the sewers constructed by Mr Houldsworth when they executed their own works in 1868. They connected new drains with certain of Mr Houldsworth's existing drains, they lifted and relaid others, and they cut off the drainage from a third class and conveyed it in a different direction. The result of their operations is, that they now discharge a much greater quantity of sewage upon the pursuer's lands than was conveyed to these lands by Mr Houldsworth's drains in 1868. The list No. 95 of process shews the number of houses draining into Coltness before the drainage scheme of 1868, immediately after the execution of the scheme, and at the present time. It shews a great increase of drainage at all the outlets, and particularly at the outlets Nos. 1 and 2 on the pursuer's plan, which afford the most serious ground of complaint; and it appears that the total number of houses draining on to the lands of Coltness, which before 1868 was 324, is now 57. I did not understand it to be maintained in argument, although it appears to be suggested on record, that the construction of Mr Houldsworth's drains implied a right to the defenders to make use of them as

No. 171.

July 14, 1887.
Houldsworth
v. Burgh of Wishaw.

parts of a larger system of drainage than Mr Houldsworth had contemplated, and for the purpose of discharging upon the lands a greater quantity of sewage than they were originally intended to carry. But it is said that the pursuer and his predecessor not only allowed this use to be made of their drains without objection, but took part in setting up the system of which he now complains. It is to be kept in view, in considering the facts on which this plea is founded, that the pursuer succeeded to the estate of Coltness on his father's death in January 1868, and that the defenders' operations were not begun till sometime after the 27th of April in that year. The conduct, therefore, upon which the defenders found their plea of acquiescence, must be the conduct of the pursuer himself, since he was proprietor of the estate at the date of the construction of the works, to the use of which it is said that he is barred from objecting. But still it may be necessary to consider what was done before his succession, since the defenders' case is that he adopted and carried on a system which had been begun by his father. The facts which are said to be material in this point of view are, that before the defenders had undertaken the duty of draining the burgh Mr Houldsworth and his tenants had made some use of the sewage, which was discharged into open ditches on his property, from the drains he had himself constructed, for the purpose of manuring their land, and that in 1867, and presumably in anticipation of the defenders' operations, he had constructed a settling-pond for the purpose of collecting the sewage on his farm of Thrashbush. This appears to have been all that was done in the late Mr Houldsworth's lifetime. When the defenders' works were executed in 1868 this settling-pond was connected with one of their sewers by a continuation of the sewers, extending for about sixty yards into Mr Houldsworth's lands, beyond the burgh boundary, and leading into an open ditch. Another settling-pond was made in the summer of 1868, at a place called Murray's Acre, for collecting the sewage discharged at another outlet of the defenders' system. And both these ponds were used for some years for the purpose of irrigating the pursuer's lands, the solid matter being allowed to settle in the ponds, and the liquid manure being carried partly by open cuts and partly by pipes through the fields. This system was pursued, and apparently with some success, for two or three years, when it was found to be mischievous, and in 1873 or 1874 it was discontinued. The settling-ponds, however, were not destroyed, but they were no longer allowed to act as receptacles of solid matter; and the sewage from the burgh now passes through them in the same way as through any other channel, no part of it being interrupted for the purpose of manuring the land."

The Lord Ordinary (Kinnear), on 28th March 1887, pronounced this interlocutor:—"Finds that the defenders, as the Local Authority of the burgh of Wishaw, have provided a system of drains and sewers for the said burgh, by the use of which, in accordance with the purpose and design of the works, sewage or drainage of a grossly polluting kind has been discharged upon the lands of Coltness, belonging to the pursuer, and into the streams called the Templegill Burn and the Whinnie Burn, running through the said lands, to the injury of the pursuer, and in violation of his legal rights: Finds that the pursuer is entitled to interdict against the continuance of the nuisance caused by the said discharge of sewage: but supersedes consideration of the cause for two months, to allow the defenders an opportunity of stating what means, if any, they are prepared to adopt for the abatement of the said nuisance," &c.*

* "OPINION.—The pursuer has proved that, by a system of drains and sewers

The defenders reclaimed, and argued ;—(1) The pursuer was not entitled to sue this action, because of the contract implied from his being in 1868

No. 171.

July 14, 1887.

Houldsworth

v. Burgh of
Wishaw.

provided for that purpose, the defenders have for many years discharged, and are still discharging, a considerable portion of the sewage of the town of Wishaw upon his property of Coltness, and have thereby created a nuisance of a very injurious character. I do not think it is seriously disputed, and, at all events, it is very clearly proved, that this discharge of sewage is in fact a nuisance. It is suggested, indeed, that the injury to the pursuer might be materially diminished if the whole of the water of a burn, called the Meadow Burn, which is now impounded for the use of a distillery, were allowed to flow in its natural course into the Templegill Burn, the pollution of which forms the chief ground of complaint. But if the pursuer is responsible, which is not proved, for the impounding of the Meadow Burn, it must be assumed that he has a right to divert the water, or to sanction its being diverted, for the benefit of the distillery, and he cannot be restricted in the exercise of his proprietary rights in order to diminish the nuisance created by a discharge of drainage which he complains of as a wrong. It is equally clear that, but for the special defence relied upon by the defenders, the discharge of sewage upon the pursuer's property would be in violation of his legal right. It makes no difference that the defenders are a body of magistrates charged with a public duty, because the Act of Parliament gives them no right which the common law refuses to throw the sewage of the town upon the pursuer's property.

"The only question of difficulty, therefore, is whether the defenders have acquired from the pursuer or his predecessors a right, which they would not have otherwise, to make this use of his property? The ground in law on which they maintain their right is not very clearly set forth in their pleas as originally stated. They do not allege any antecedent agreement, by virtue of which they became entitled to discharge sewage on the pursuer's lands, or to execute the drainage works which they use for that purpose. But by a plea which was added after the close of the proof, they plead that the pursuer is barred from maintaining the action (1) Because he and his predecessors in the lands of Coltness took part in setting up the sewage system of which he complains, acquiesced therein, and took benefit therefrom; (2) Because the alleged nuisance is due to his own actings in disusing his irrigation works, and feuing or leasing his lands within the burgh.

"The question therefore is, whether the facts which have been proved are sufficient to support this plea in either of its branches?"

(His Lordship then stated the facts as above narrated, and proceeded)—"These are the material facts; and they appear to me to be insufficient of themselves to establish either a grant of servitude, or any binding contract between the pursuer and the defenders. The operations, so far as they were conducted on the pursuer's land, are said to have been executed by the late land-steward Mr Fair, who had no authority to make any agreement for subjecting his employer's land to a permanent burden; and the pursuer himself does not appear to have been consulted as to any arrangement for taking sewage from the burgh. The defenders, indeed, as already observed, do not allege that there was any actual agreement, either with the pursuer himself or with any person authorised to bind him. But they say that, independently of any antecedent bargain, the facts imply an agreement for the mutual advantage of the parties, by which the defenders are allowed to get rid of their sewage, and the pursuer is allowed to utilise it for the benefit of his land. But an agreement for mutual advantage must be binding on both parties; and it is not suggested that the defenders are under obligation to the pursuer to give him the sewage of the burgh in perpetuity, even although they should be able hereafter to dispose of it otherwise to greater advantage. The pursuer must, no doubt, be held to have accepted the sewage which he tried to make use of for his own benefit. But the question is, whether he has bound himself to submit to the continuance of the nuisance in perpetuity; it is not alleged that he has agreed to do so, and I am unable to

No. 171.

July 14, 1887.
Houldsworth
v. Burgh of Wishaw.

a party to the making of the works now complained of. The pursuer had an interest in getting the sewage for use in the irrigation works he made, and the defenders were under an obligation to him to give it. The Lord Ordinary was in error in thinking that the defenders did not maintain that they were under an obligation to the pursuer. There was nothing improbable in the agreement said to be implied, as the pursuer was interested in the prosperity of Wishaw. (2) In any view, the pursuer was barred by acquiescence for nearly twenty years in the present system of drainage. The argument from acquiescence was quite independent of any alleged see anything in his conduct which should bar him from denying that he has so agreed.

"But it is said that, apart from any agreement, express or implied, he is barred by acquiescence from complaining of a nuisance which he ought to have prevented before any cost had been incurred, if he did not intend to submit to it. The pursuer himself was not much at Coltness during the year 1868; and no communication was made to him on the part of the burgh, either verbally or by letter, as to their drainage scheme. Nor does he appear to have been fully informed as to the operations which were going on, either within the burgh boundaries or on his own estate. But he knew, on the one hand, that the Local Authority was executing works for the drainage of the burgh, and, on the other, that his land-steward was executing works for the irrigation of his land. He must be held, in a question with the burgh, to have assented to what was done by the persons to whom he left the management of his property; and acquiescence will therefore be pleadable against him to the same effect as if the operations upon his estate had been executed by his direct instructions. But assuming that to be so, all that is proved is, that he allowed the burgh to discharge a quantity of sewage upon his land, endeavoured to make use of it for his own benefit, and made no complaint until it turned out to be a nuisance. It appears from the evidence of Mr Bain, the factor, that the nuisance first began to be seriously offensive in 1877. The attention of the Local Authority was called to it in that year, and it has been growing worse and worse every year since then. Acquiescence in a nuisance, so long as it is not serious, will not deprive a proprietor of his right to object to it when it is materially increased. Nor does it appear to me to make any difference that he has endeavoured, in the meantime, to neutralise it by operations upon his own land, or even to turn it to advantage. Assuming that the pursuer must be held to have assented to the discharge of sewage, to which he submitted in 1868, or even until 1877, it does not follow that he has also assented to the greatly increased discharge of which he now complains. It is said that he has permitted a drainage system to be carried out, which cannot now be altered without great cost. But there is no evidence that the system was carried out in reliance on any conduct on the pursuer's part, from which the Local Authority was entitled to infer that he was willing to accept the sewage of the whole drainage district which they now discharged upon his lands. The evidence of Mr Reid shews that the system which they adopted in 1868 was the cheapest and most convenient for the burgh at the time, and that there will be no difficulty in sending the sewage in a different direction now, if it should be found that the pursuer is not bound to submit to the nuisance. It is true that about £78 of the original cost of constructing the present drains will be lost to the burgh if their drains are made useless. But, on the other hand, the burgh saved £105 by adopting the drains which had been already constructed by the late Mr Houldsworth; and, in the meantime, they have had the benefit of the cheaper system for upwards of eighteen years.

"The second branch of the defenders' plea cannot be sustained, if the plea is not well founded in its first branch. If the pursuer is not bound to accept whatever amount of sewage the defenders may think fit to discharge upon his estate, he is under no obligation to them to continue his irrigation works, when irrigation by sewage has proved to be injurious to the land. That he has fenced or leased his land within the burgh, can give no right to the burgh authorities to discharge sewage upon his estate beyond the burgh to his nuisance."

difficulty as to contract. The principle which applied was contained in the judgment of Lord Campbell in *Cairncross v. Lorimer*¹—viz., “if a man either by words or by conduct has intimated that he consents to an act which has been done, and that he will offer no opposition to it although it could not have been lawfully done without his consent, and he thereby induces others to do that from which they might otherwise have abstained—he cannot question the legality of the act he has so sanctioned to the prejudice of those who have given faith to his words, or to the fair inference to be drawn from his conduct. The same principle was applied in Aytoun’s case.²”

No. 171.

July 14, 1887.
Houldsworth
v. Burgh of Wishaw.

The pursuer’s counsel was not called on.

At advising,—

LORD JUSTICE-CLERK.—In this case we had a very able speech from Mr Balfour against the interlocutor of the Lord Ordinary; but we do not think it necessary to call for any reply, because it appears to us that that interlocutor is founded on sound principles, and ought to be adhered to.

I need not resume at any length the nature of the contention, because, notwithstanding the very voluminous print which we have here, the case lies within a very narrow compass indeed.

The action is an action for interdict against the Police Commissioners of the burgh of Wishaw, and it seeks to interdict them from discharging the sewage of the burgh upon the lands of the pursuer, Mr Houldsworth. A variety of questions are raised, but the substantial defence—that to which counsel for the Commissioners in the end came in opening his case—is this. It is summed up in the third plea in law, which is to the effect that the defenders having a right to discharge the sewage of the burgh on the pursuer’s land, as set forth in the defenders’ statement of facts, they ought to be assoilzied.

On that question I have come to the clearest opinion that the Commissioners have no right whatever to discharge the sewage of the burgh upon the lands of the pursuer without his consent. Another question, which is a somewhat subordinate but relative question, which has had to be considered is this, whether Mr Houldsworth had bound himself to permit this use of his land, and in what manner that agreement or undertaking on his part had been expressed.

An outline of the facts may shortly be given. Prior to 1868 the late Mr Houldsworth had strong faith in sewage irrigation, and to a certain extent had practised it in concert with the burgh of Wishaw. In 1868 the burgh of Wishaw entered upon a new scheme for the sanitary purposes of the burgh. There was, in particular, a new plan made out for the disposition of the sewage. Undoubtedly in the knowledge of Mr Houldsworth they went to considerable expense in the construction of drains which communicated with other drains already constructed. Many of these drains communicated with sewers that were constructed on Mr Houldsworth’s land. The result was that the drainage of the burgh was carried off from the burgh to the lands of Mr Houldsworth, and that in a manner—for that was the purpose in view—which gave facilities for using it for sewage irrigation. Now, the sewage was used for that purpose pretty extensively. There were works on Mr Houldsworth’s own land which he had constructed himself for the purpose of disposing of the sewage when it

¹ August 9, 1860, 3 Macq. 827.

² Aytoun v. Melville, M. App. voce Property, No. 6, May 19, 1801.

No. 171.

July 14, 1887.
Houldsworth
v. Burgh of
Wishaw.

was taken to his lands. There were also works within the burgh which were constructed certainly in the knowledge of Mr Houldsworth, and to a certain extent constructed at his own expense. From 1868 to 1874 that system was continued by the present Mr Houldsworth, who succeeded his father in 1868. But after the time I have mentioned the whole scheme fell through as far as it was a beneficial operation for the agricultural value of the lands of Mr Houldsworth. Any benefit the lands derived is said to have come to an end. The drainage system, however, remained in the same position, and the drainage has gone on in the same way ever since, flowing to a certain extent, at all events, through the lands of Mr Houldsworth. The question now is, the present Mr Houldsworth being entirely dissatisfied with the state of matters now existing, and not in the least inclined or prepared to continue the present system, is he under any obligation to do so? Now, Mr Balfour maintained quite unreservedly that not only was he bound to submit to this discharge of sewage on his own land, but that what was effected by the late Mr Houldsworth and the burgh amounted to a perpetual contract between the owner of the lower land,—that is, Mr Houldsworth on the one hand, and the authorities of the burgh of Wishaw on the other hand; that the burgh authorities were bound to Mr Houldsworth to continue to discharge the sewage on the lands of Coltness, and that in like manner Mr Houldsworth was bound to continue to allow the drainage to be received upon his lands. There is nothing in the shape of writing that could by possibility be construed to amount to a contract or agreement of that kind. Mr Houldsworth, who, as I have mentioned, succeeded his father in 1868, positively denies that he ever made, or dreamed of making, an agreement of that kind, and the mode in which the agreement was supposed to be constituted, according to counsel for the burgh, was by permission, or rather a tacit encouragement or inducement, to expend money in structural works, which could only have been done on the footing of such an agreement having been entered into. Now, I have no doubt at all that the commissioners for the burgh of Wishaw did spend their money on those structural works, and that they hoped and believed that the proprietor of Coltness would remain of the same opinion in regard to his own interest as that which induced them to commence these operations. But the proprietor was not under any manner of obligation to do so. It was a matter of mutual convenience during the pleasure of both parties, and either the one or the other could have determined the arrangement at any period they might choose.

That is the general conclusion which I have come to, and that is what the Lord Ordinary has found. Indeed the nature of the thing necessarily implies that either party could terminate the arrangement at any period which might be chosen by the particular party wishing to bring it to an end. The Commissioners could have stopped sending the sewage on to these lands at any time. They might have disposed of the sewage otherwise. There was nothing to prevent them adopting another mode. Nothing took place in the course of their proceedings to prevent them making use of the best mode for the burgh which they could find. And indeed, suppose that had not been the case, but that they had entered into a perpetual agreement of the nature contended for, I doubt very greatly if they would have had power to bind their successors in such an arrangement. The ground of my opinion, therefore, in conformity with the opinion of the Lord Ordinary, is that there is no such agreement as that founded on, and that the burgh did not acquire any right to continue the transmission of sewage through the lands of Coltness contrary to the will of the proprietor. It has now become nothing but a nuisance as far as the estate of Coltness is concerned. That is plain enough, and I do not think the proprietor of the lands is bound to submit to it.

No. 171.

July 14, 1887.
Houldsworth
v. Burgh of Wishaw.

LORD YOUNG.—I am of the same opinion, and I own without any difficulty. The conclusion of the summons is for declarator that the defenders are not entitled to emit or discharge from the sewers or pipes under their control sewage and drainage matter upon the lands of the pursuer. I repeat that that is simply a declaratory conclusion. The only other conclusion is for interdict conform to that declaratory conclusion. The Lord Ordinary has pronounced decree in terms of the declaratory conclusion, superseding the case with respect to the interdict upon very intelligible and, I think, proper grounds. Now, it is admitted in the able and exhaustive opening speech of the counsel for the Commissioners that the defenders were not entitled to discharge their sewage on the pursuer's lands unless they could shew a contract with him to that effect—that what they were doing could not be defended, and therefore could not be continued against objections on the part of the proprietor, unless a contract with the pursuer as the proprietor of the lands could be shewn. There was indeed an alternative plea of acquiescence,—that is, that the pursuer saw, and indeed must have seen, when the drains were constructed, that the Commissioners intended to discharge the sewage upon his land, and that if he did not object then, he is barred by acquiescence from objecting now to the discharge of that sewage by means of the system which he allowed to be established with that end in view. Now, in these sentences I think I have stated the whole case.

I do not think I should have allowed a proof upon such a plea as that upon the present record. I should have thought it clear that the pursuer had stated a relevant case to which there was no relevant defence. That would have been my opinion, and I should therefore not have been disposed to permit any evidence to be led at all. But taking the evidence which we have here, I am clearly of opinion with the Lord Ordinary and with your Lordship that no such contract has been established as that which alone could be a defence to the action. It would be a very anomalous contract—though intelligible enough and stateable enough—that the burgh of Wishaw shall, on the one hand, be entitled and bound to discharge their sewage upon the pursuer's land, and that the pursuer, on the other hand, shall be entitled and bound to receive it, these being the obligations and rights hinc inde, the one party entitled and bound to send the sewage, and the other party bound and at the same time entitled to receive it. But I think a contract of that kind would require to be put into writing, or at least into very distinct expression. One would not readily imply it from facts and circumstances. It is such an out-of-the-way thing that one could not readily infer it from any facts and circumstances without there being writing upon it. Now, of such a contract I here find no relevant allegation. There is nothing in the record of that nature, and I find no support for it in the evidence at all. And as to acquiescence, it is said that the time for the pursuer to object was when the Commissioners were forming their drains, and that, if he did not object then, he must take the consequence in all time coming, and must receive the sewage which the inhabitants of Wishaw discharge through these pipes. I think that proposition is simply extravagant. I

No. 171.

July 14, 1887.
Houldsworth
v. Burgh of Wishaw.

should not upon any statement in the record have allowed any evidence upon that point, but as far as the evidence goes, I think there is no evidence in support of that proposition.

LORD CRAIGHILL.—I am entirely of the same opinion. I think the case is a very clear one as presented by the Lord Ordinary in his note. In regard to what Lord Young has said, I do not think it necessary to enlarge upon the question of contract or acquiescence. I am clear that neither contract nor acquiescence has been established.

LORD RUTHERFURD CLARK.—I agree.

THE COURT adhered, with this variation, made of consent, that the time allowed to the defenders was extended to the first sederunt-day in October.

MURRAY, BEITH, & MURRAY, W.S.—D. HILL MURRAY, Solicitor—Agents.

No. 172.

July 15, 1887.
Dow v. Imrie.

REVEREND PETER DOW, First Party.—Ure.
REVEREND D. N. IMRIE, Second Party.—Pearson.

Church—Stipend—Assistant and Successor—Annat.—It was provided in an agreement between a parish minister and his assistant and successor that the former should "surrender" to the latter £165 "of the annual income derivable from the benefice of said parish, payable half-yearly at Martinmas and Whitsunday." The minister having died on 29th April, held that under the agreement his executor was not bound to pay the assistant for his services between the previous Martinmas and that day, the stipend for that period being payable to the minister's next of kin as annat, and there having been no personal obligation upon him and his representatives to make any payment.

1ST DIVISION.
M.

THE REVEREND W. M. IMRIE, minister of the parish of Penicuik, having fallen into ill-health in 1886, an assistant and successor was appointed to him in the usual way.

On 30th July and 3d August of that year a minute of agreement was executed between Mr Imrie and the Rev. Peter Dow, his assistant and successor. The agreement bore,—“The parties hereto considering that on or about the 26th of December 1885, the said party of the first part, in consequence of ill-health, found it necessary to retire from the active duties of minister of the parish of Penicuik, and that he had agreed to surrender to an assistant and successor a certain sum of money per annum, as after specified, which said agreement was thereafter sanctioned and approved of by the Presbytery of Dalkeith,—therefore the parties have agreed, and hereby agree as follows, videlicet:—First, the said first party agrees (1) to surrender to the said second party the sum of £8, 6s. 8d. sterling, being the allowance for communion elements, and the sum of £165 sterling of the annual income derivable from the benefice of said parish, payable half-yearly at the terms of Martinmas and Whitsunday from and after the 3d day of August 1886, being the date at which the said second party is to enter upon the duties of assistant and successor, beginning the first term's payment thereof at Martinmas next for the proportion to fall due from the said 3d day of August 1886 to that term, and the next term's payment thereof at Whitsunday thereafter for the half year immediately preceding, and so forth half-yearly, termly, and continually thereafter during the lifetime of the said Peter Dow, so long as he shall be the said first party's assistant; and (2) to give up the manse and offices for the use and behoof of the said second party, on condition that he, the said second party, shall pay all taxes and other assessments exigible in respect of the manse and offices.” No. 172.

Mr Imrie died unmarried on 29th April 1887. The stipend of the parish, which amounted to £314, 16s. 10d., exclusive of manse and offices, was due at Whitsunday and Michaelmas, but was, as matter of practice, collected half-yearly at Whitsunday and Martinmas. At Martinmas 1886, Mr Dow was paid the proportion of £165 effeiring to the period from the date of his induction to Martinmas 1886. July 15, 1887.
Dow v. Imrie.

Mr Dow having claimed a proportion of the sum of £165 corresponding to the period from 11th November 1886 to 29th April 1887—being £76, 8s. under deduction of income-tax,—a question arose between him and Mr Imrie’s executor as to whether it was due under the agreement, and a special case was arranged between them in which this question was put to the Court:—“Is the late Mr Imrie’s executor bound to pay out of the executry estate the foresaid sum of £76, 8s. to Mr Dow for services as Mr Imrie’s assistant and successor between the term of Martinmas 1886 and the 29th April 1887, the date of Mr Imrie’s death?”

Mr Dow, the first party, maintained that under the agreement he was entitled to a fixed sum of money from Mr Imrie during “the lifetime of the said Peter Dow so long as he shall be the said first party’s” (Mr Imrie’s) “assistant”; that on a sound construction of the minute of agreement, what Mr Imrie agreed to “surrender” was “a certain sum of money per annum,” and not the stipend of the parish, and that the word “surrender” in the first article of the said minute of agreement imported an obligation upon Mr Imrie to pay; that the sum to be paid to Mr Dow was not to be so paid when the stipend became due, but at the terms of Whitsunday and Martinmas; that Mr Imrie paid to Mr Dow the proportion of the sum due to him up till Martinmas 1886 from the 3d August preceding, whilst Mr Imrie had only in point of fact received stipend up till Michaelmas 1886; that no part of the stipend of the parish was ever conveyed by Mr Imrie to Mr Dow; that Mr Dow did not draw from the heritors any part of it, but Mr Imrie during his lifetime drew the whole of it without asking or obtaining the consent of Mr Dow; and that as a condition of Mr Imrie drawing the whole of the said stipend, he was bound either to discharge the duties of parish minister himself, or to provide and pay a substitute, if he were not able; and that Mr Dow having been the substitute appointed, he was entitled to be paid out of Mr Imrie’s estate the sum stipulated in the said minute of agreement.

Mr Imrie’s executor maintained that on a sound construction of the agreement, and as in a question between Mr Dow and Mr Imrie, the former took the place of the latter as regarded the manse and offices, the communion element money, and the stipend so far as surrendered; that in consequence of Mr Imrie’s death in April, the stipend which would otherwise have been payable at Whitsunday 1887 having passed to Mr Imrie’s next of kin as annat, there was no stipend to surrender for the period in question; and that, there being no personal obligation on Mr Imrie, independently of the agreement, to surrender part of the stipend, Mr Dow was not entitled to more than had been already paid to him.

It was explained that the income of the benefice consisted to a large extent of feu-duties payable out of the glebe.¹

At advising,—

LORD PRESIDENT.—In the course of last year, Mr Imrie, minister of the parish

¹ Authorities cited.—Latta v. Edinburgh Ecclesiastical Commissioners, Nov. 10, 1877, 5 R. 266; Glebe Lands (Scotland) Act, 1866 (29 and 30 Vict. cap. 11), sec. 15.

No. 172. of Penicuik, became incapable of continuing the duties of his office, and in consequence Mr Dow, the first party to this special case, was appointed Mr Imrie's assistant and successor with the approval of the Presbytery. It became necessary that an arrangement should be made between the minister and his assistant and successor as to the remuneration of the latter, and the substance of the arrangement which was come to may be very simply stated. Mr Dow was to have possession of the manse and offices, and was to get a certain proportion of the stipend amounting to £165, leaving £149 with the minister. This arrangement was reduced to writing, and it is as to the construction of it that our opinion is asked.

July 15, 1887.
Dow v. Imrie.

The first payment under the agreement fell due at Martinmas last, and was duly made. Mr Dow received the allowance due to him for the period from 3d August besides the stipulated allowance for communion elements, and he had also possession of the manse. Before the next term of Whitsunday—viz., the 29th of April last—Mr Imrie died. The effect of that was that no stipend was to be paid to him after Martinmas 1886, as for the half year from Michaelmas or Martinmas 1886 to Whitsunday 1887 it belonged to his next of kin, and that not in the character of his representatives or executors, but in their own right. That half year's stipend never belonged to Mr Imrie at all, because he died before the Whitsunday term arrived. The contention of Mr Dow is that, notwithstanding that that stipend never belonged to Mr Imrie, that gentleman and his personal representatives are liable to him in payment of a sum of £76, 8s. being the proportion of stipend due to him for that period as stipulated in the agreement.

I can quite see that there is a great deal of hardship in Mr Dow's case, because he performed the work of the parish for nearly half a year, and yet is to receive no remuneration, if Mr Imrie's executor's contention be sound. Nevertheless, looking to the terms of the agreement, I do not think it is possible to say that Mr Dow is entitled to anything except what comes to Mr Imrie in the shape of stipend. I cannot get over the words contained in the first paragraph of the minute. The first party agrees to "surrender" a certain sum per annum. That provision seems to assume that Mr Imrie must draw the stipend before he can pay Mr Dow a share of it. Mr Dow would have no title to operate upon the stipend at his own instance. The heritors would not pay it to him, and he had no assignation to it. It is clear that it must be uplifted by the minister before any of it can be paid to Mr Dow, and that then, and then only, the minister is under an obligation to pay to him. The obligation cannot arise until the stipend has been actually uplifted.

It appears to me therefore that the terms of the agreement preclude the possibility of our acceding to Mr Dow's contention that the executor shall pay the £76, 8s., which is said to be due for the term of service after Martinmas 1886. According to that contention the agreement must be construed as imposing a personal obligation on Mr Imrie to pay certain money to Mr Dow, whether it was received in the form of stipend or not. I have therefore come to the conclusion that the question must be answered in the negative.

LORD MURE, LORD SHAND, and LORD ADAM concurred.

THE COURT accordingly answered the question in the negative.

LINDSAY MACKERSY, W.S.—H. W. CORNILLON, S.S.C.—Agents.

JOSEPH SMITH, Pursuer (Respondent).—Shaw—Wilson.
LIVERPOOL AND LONDON AND GLOBE INSURANCE COMPANY, Defenders (Reclaimers).—Darling—G. R. Gillespie.

No. 173.

July 15, 1887.
Smith v.
Liverpool and
London and Globe Insurance Co.

Arbitration—Appointment of oversman—Casting lots.—Two arbiters, who had power to appoint an oversman, differed as to which of two persons should be nominated. Both were agreed that the two were equally eligible, and eventually they selected one by lot. Held that the appointment was valid.

Arbitration—Oversman—Disqualification.—Held that two arbiters, who had power to appoint an oversman, were not entitled to appoint a person who was a shareholder in an unincorporated company—one of the parties to the reference.

IN May 1885, a fire occurred in the shop of Mr Joseph Smith, shoemaker, Stenton, East Lothian. Smith's stock, &c., was insured against fire to the extent of £300 with the Liverpool and London and Globe Insurance Company.

1st DIVISION.
Lord Lee.
M.

Smith's claims under the insurance policy were by a deed of submission referred by him and the Company to the decision of Messrs James Brand, auctioneer, Dunbar, and J. S. Mair, merchant, Glasgow, arbiters mutually chosen, and in case of their differing, to the decision of an oversman to be chosen by the arbiters before entering on the business of the submission.

By deed of nomination, executed by Messrs Brand and Mair, who had accepted office, Mr William Lyon, auctioneer, was on 25th February 1886, appointed oversman, and he subsequently agreed to act. Mr Lyon heard the proof in the arbitration, along with the arbiters, and the arguments of parties upon it, which occupied two days. The arbiters having differed in opinion as to the amount to which the pursuer was entitled, it was arranged that they should meet with the oversman in Edinburgh, and give in written reasons in support of their respective opinions. The oversman first issued notes of his proposed award, and thereafter on 7th June following pronounced a decret-arbitral, which was signed on 1st July, awarding Smith £70 in full of his claims, and giving no expenses to either party.

Immediately thereafter Smith brought an action of reduction of the deed of nomination of 25th February, and of the decret-arbitral. He called the Insurance Company, the arbiters, and the oversman as defenders.

He stated,—(Cond. 7) "The said William Lyon was not fairly, properly, or legally chosen to be oversman. The said arbiters did not bona fide concur in the choice of the said William Lyon, or exercise their judgment as to his appointment, but tossed or cast lots for the oversman to be appointed, or for the exclusive right to name an oversman; and it was the result of such tossing or casting of lots that the said William Lyon was appointed as oversman. . . . The said arbiters, in appointing the said William Lyon in the manner mentioned, acted in violation of their trust-duty." (Cond. 8) "The said William Lyon was personally disqualified from acting as oversman in the said submission by reason of his interest in, and connection with, the said Insurance Company. Besides being a shareholder in the Company to the extent of £800, he was regularly employed by them professionally; and in consequence, his mind was biassed in favour of the Company, and his impartiality was destroyed. . . ." (Cond. 9) "Immediately upon the pursuer becoming aware of the improper way in which Mr Lyon had been appointed, and of his said disqualification for the post, the pursuer formally intimated that he declined the jurisdiction of the said William Lyon as oversman,

No. 173. protested against his continuing to act in the submission, and called upon the arbiters to name another oversman."

July 15, 1887.
Smith v.
Liverpool and
London and Globe Insurance Co.

The defenders generally denied the pursuer's averments in conds. 7 and 8, and stated in regard to Mr Lyon's appointment as oversman,—"The arbiters met in Edinburgh on 23d February 1886, when Mr Mair suggested Mr Lyon, and Mr Brand suggested Mr Dowell, auctioneer, Edinburgh, as oversman. Both arbiters having stated that they had no objection to either of these gentlemen, but each preferring his own nominee, they agreed to draw lots to determine which of these gentlemen should be appointed, and the lot fell upon Mr Lyon. Both arbiters, in the exercise of their judgment, agreed to approve of either of the gentlemen named; and after drawing lots, both approved of Mr Lyon's nomination." They further stated that the pursuer's agent had made no protest against Mr Lyon's acting until he had issued notes of his proposed award, which the pursuer considered unfavourable.

The pursuer pleaded, inter alia;—(1) The nomination of the said William Lyon as oversman in the said submission having been determined by chance, and not by the mutual choice of the said arbiters, the said deed of nomination, and all that has followed on it, ought to be set aside. (4) The said William Lyon having been personally disqualified from acting as oversman, his nomination and the said decree-arbitral ought to be reduced.

The defenders pleaded, inter alia;—(2) The statements of the pursuer being unfounded in fact, the defenders are entitled to be assoilized. (4) The pursuer having homologated the nomination of the oversman, he is barred from suing this action.

The following summary of the evidence in the case is taken from the Lord Ordinary's note:—

"1. The oversman was selected by casting lots. After some discussion as to the propriety of appointing a practical shoemaker, each arbiter proposed an auctioneer. The arbiter appointed by the Company proposed Mr Lyon, and the arbiter appointed by the pursuer proposed Mr Dowell. As neither would agree to the oversman proposed by the other, the arbiters agreed to cast lots, and the lot fell upon Mr Lyon.*

"2. Mr Lyon was at this time, and still is, a holder of capital stock of the defenders' Company to the extent of £50, and the present value of which is about £830, being twenty-five shares, each of the value of £33, 10s. The total stock of the Company is £245,000. Mr Lyon had also been employed by the Company occasionally as a valuator.

"3. At the time when he was so selected, Mr Lyon was unknown to both arbiters excepting by repute as an auctioneer of experience. Neither

* Mr Brand deposed as to this:—"We could not agree then about an oversman. I said to Mr Mair that I thought it was a pity he had not accepted of a practical man for oversman, but he deprecated having anyone apparently but Mr Lyon. I proposed Mr Dowell. I said I did not know Mr Lyon unless by repute, and that I had no acquaintance with him, but that Mr Dowell I knew well and intimately. Mr Mair, however, would not agree to Mr Dowell. I said, so far as I recollect, that I had no objection to Mr Lyon, and that I supposed he would be a man capable of filling the position of oversman, although I did not know him. That was to say that if Mr Mair did not want a practical man, but an auctioneer, I proposed Mr Dowell. When I found that he would not agree to Mr Dowell, I then said we had better draw lots; but I am not very sure whether it was Mr Mair or myself who proposed that; at all events it was proposed, and we proceeded to put the two names into a hat. I drew the lot out, and it happened to be Mr Lyon." This evidence was corroborated by Mr Mair.

arbiters had made any inquiries as to his fitness, and neither was aware that he was a shareholder in the defenders' Company. It is now stated by each of them that had this been known he would not have been proposed or appointed; but it was stated by the pursuer's arbiter at the time when this mode of selection was agreed to, that he had no objection to Mr Lyon, and supposed that he would be capable of filling the position, although he did not know him.

No. 173.

July 15, 1887.
Smith v.
Liverpool and
London and Globe Insurance
Co.

"4. When the result of the arbiters' meeting to select an oversman was communicated to the parties and to Mr Lyon, neither he nor the defenders noticed or adverted to the fact that he was a shareholder. The fact appears to have been overlooked by them, and was not mentioned even when the formal nomination and acceptance were executed.* It was not within the knowledge of the pursuer or his agents. It was first mentioned after the proof had been concluded, and at the meeting of arbiters and oversman for consideration of the award, when Mr Lyon stated that it had come to his recollection.† At this meeting the agents of the parties were not present. But the arbiters, considering that the proceedings were so far advanced, concurred in asking Mr Lyon to proceed. The clerk suggested no difficulty, and Mr Lyon appears to have agreed to do so, without any communication with the parties or their agents. A minute of devolution was accordingly executed at this meeting.

"5. As soon as the fact came to the knowledge of the pursuer's agents, they lodged a minute declining the oversman's jurisdiction, and requesting the arbiters to name a new oversman. Notwithstanding of this Mr Lyon proceeded to issue his notes of the proposed award (against which the pursuer's agents represented under protest), and he subsequently, on 1st July 1886, issued the award now under reduction. The pursuer's agents appear also to have protested against the mode in which the oversman was selected when it came to their knowledge."

The Lord Ordinary (Lee), on 23d March 1887, after proof (the substance of which so far as material is given above), sustained the reasons of reduc-

* Mr Lyon deponed as to this:—"It was a few days before the 26th April that it had been recalled to me that I was a shareholder. I was walking along George Street, when a gentleman stopped me and said, 'Lyon, have you still your shares in the Liverpool, London, and Globe, because we are going to get a big dividend?' I said I was very glad to hear it. (Q.) Do you recollect what happened at that meeting after you had announced that you were a shareholder? (A.) Mr Brand and Mr Mair talked together with reference to the amount that they thought it should be settled for, and I said to them not to let £10 stand between them in the matter, but to get it adjusted and divide the difference, or something like that. (Q.) Did you suggest that there might be a difficulty about your being a shareholder? (A.) Yes, certainly. I said I considered it to be my duty to tell them that I was a shareholder before they devolved the reference upon me. They considered the matter and consulted together, and said they were satisfied that I would do what was right, and were quite satisfied that I should act in the matter, and they requested me to proceed, which I did."

† Mr Lyon deponed as to this:—"Further than the communication to the arbiters on 26th April, I did not make any communication to the parties or their agents at any time; I understood that that was entirely in the hands of Mr Kirk Mackie, S.S.C., the clerk to the reference. I issued notes of my award on 29th April. In the notes of my proposed findings there was intimation given to the parties that I was a shareholder. Shortly thereafter I found that the subject had been tabled of my acting as oversman. That was by minute lodged by the claimant on 10th May. That was the next step in the proceedings after I issued my notes of my proposed findings."

No. 173. tion set forth in the first and fourth pleas for the pursuer, and gave decree of reduction accordingly.*

July 15, 1887.
Smith v.
Liverpool and
London and Globe Insurance Co.

* "NOTE.— . . . I. As to the question of casting lots, the law stands upon a clear principle. It requires that both arbiters shall exercise a judgment upon the fitness of the person selected (In re Cassel, 9 B. and C., 624; Hodson v. Drenry, 7 Dowling, P. C. Reps. 569; The European and American S.S. Company v. Crosskey, 8 Scott's C. B. Reps. N. S. 397, and 29 L. J., Com. Pl., 155; Bell on Arb., 188; Russell on Arb., 226). A bare selection by lot cannot therefore be supported. If, however, each arbiter exercises his judgment as to the fitness of two persons, and both agree that both of these are fit and proper for the office, it is no objection that lots have been cast as to which of them shall be appointed. In such a case, however, it is essential, and it is implied in the decisions overruling the objection, that both of the persons for whom lots have been cast must have been selected by each of the arbiters as fit for the appointment (Neale v. Ledger, 16 East, 51; re Hopper, L. R., Q. B. 367).

"In the present case, I am of opinion that there was no agreement as to the fitness of Mr Lyon, such as existed with reference to the oversman appointed in the case of Hopper. A material fact, which was within the knowledge both of Mr Lyon and of the defenders at the time when the nomination was signed and accepted, was from inadvertence uncommunicated to the arbiters or to the other party. According to well-established practice, it was the duty of the oversman to intimate that he was a shareholder of the defenders' Company when he was informed of the appointment, or at least before proceeding to exercise his functions; and Mr Lyon recognised this duty by mentioning the matter to the arbiters as soon as it came to his recollection. The nomination was intimated to him about 24th February. It was accepted by him on 2d March. But the fact that he was a shareholder was not mentioned to the arbiters until 26th April; and it did not reach the pursuer's agents until some days after he had agreed, at the request of the arbiters, to continue to act. Whether it was an absolute disqualification or not, I think that the parties interested should have been informed of it. They might have waived the objection, but the arbiters could not do so; nor did they, until the 26th April, when they did so on account of the advanced stage of the proceedings, and without the concurrence of the parties. Both arbiters state that at the time of the appointment they would have recognised the fact as an objection, and would not have made the appointment had they known of it.

"I am, therefore, of opinion that the appointment in this case must be regarded as a bare appointment by lot, and that it cannot be supported.

"I think that the case is ruled by that of Crosskey, and is not in the same class as the cases of Neale v. Ledger and of Hopper.

"II. With regard to the other objection, my opinion is that it is also well founded. No doubt the interest of Mr Lyon was extremely small; so small, that in no event could the arbitration affect him to the extent of more than a few shillings. But I cannot say that his interest was so remote or shadowy as to raise no duty of disclosure.

"I think that there was a duty of disclosure incumbent both upon him and upon the defenders. It cannot be said that it was immaterial whether that duty was discharged or not; for it is impossible now to say that the objection would have been waived.

"The question, therefore, is, whether it is a good ground of declinature that an oversman is a shareholder of the company which is concerned as one of the parties to the arbitration; and I think it is.

"Although it does not stand upon the same ground as the objection of relationship to one of the parties, which is statutory, it is clearly implied in recent enactments that at common law there is no answer to it (see Court of Session Act, 1868, sec. 103, and Act of Sederunt, February 1, 1820). And there are many cases in which the objection has been given effect to (see Aberdeen Bank

The defenders reclaimed, and argued;—(1) Upon the first point the case differed from those in which it had been held that the appointment had been made by chance, and was therefore bad. Upon the evidence, both arbiters were agreed that either Mr Lyon or Mr Dowell would be a satisfactory choice,—and that being so, it was quite legitimate to draw lots as between them. There was thus selection, and not a bare appointment by lot. Personal knowledge was not necessary. The circumstances of this case were on all-fours with those of In re Hopper,¹ in which the authority of *Neale v. Ledger*¹ had been reaffirmed. (2) The appointment of an oversman by the arbiters was no doubt a trust power, but the fact of that power being delegated to the arbiters by the parties deprived the latter of the right to take any but the most substantial objections to any appointment they might make. The real inquiry here was whether Mr Lyon had sufficient interest in the defenders' Company to create a bias in his mind. On a calculation the whole temptation which he had to decide in favour of the Company amounted to two shillings. Cases dealing with the statutory objection (Acts 1594, cap. 216, and 1681, cap. 13), founded on relationship were not in point. They rendered the proceedings null at any time.² In the cases of the Lord Advocate v. The Commissioners of Supply of Edinburgh,³ and Sibbald's Trustees v. Greig, &c.,⁴ it was impossible to say that the Judges whose declinatures were repelled by the Court had not an interest or were not parties to the cause. What the Court inquired into was the question whether they had such an interest as would disqualify them,—“whether the interest was such as would have a palpable tendency to create a bias in the mind of an ordinary man.”⁵ Any interest would not disqualify them.⁶ The 103d section of the Court

No. 173.

July 15, 1887.
Smith v.
Liverpool and
London and Globe Insurance Co.

r. Scottish Equitable Insurance Co., 22 D. 162; Blaikie's Trustees v. Scottish Widows' Fund, 2 M. 595, in which six Judges were allowed to decline).

“It was argued that the case of a Judge of the Supreme Court is different, and that his declinature rests entirely upon privilege. I cannot assent to this view. I think that the right to decline arises out of the existence of a ground of objection. In so far as it can be called a privilege, it is possessed, even in a more unqualified way, by arbiters and oversmen. For a Judge is under obligation to exercise his office, and cannot refuse to do his duty towards any of the public except upon a sufficient ground. The situation of an arbiter or oversman is not less delicate than that of a Judge, and he can always decline. The only peculiarity in the case of a Judge arises from the limited number. For it was held in two cases that where the duty of deciding a cause could not be done if a declinator was sustained, it must be repelled (Douglas, Heron, & Co., 1774, Hailes' Decns. 563; and Friendly Insurance Co., Elch. Jurisdiction, 50).

“III. It was contended that, even if these objections were well founded, they were not a sufficient ground for reducing the nomination and decreet-arbital after so much procedure. I think that the case of Ommaney v. Smith, 13 D. 578, and the two cases in 5 Brown's Supplement there mentioned, are decisive against this contention. It cannot be said that in this case there was any delay in taking the objection.”

¹ In re Hopper, Jan. 17, 1867, L. R. 2 Q. B. 367; Neale v. Ledger, 1812, 16 East's Reps. 51.

² Highland Roads Commissioners v. Machray, Croall & Co., June 25, 1858, 20 D. 1165, 29 Scot. Jur. 663; Duke of Athole v. Robertson, Dec. 15, 1869, 8 Macph. 299, 42 Scot. Jur. 135; Ommaney v. Smith, Feb. 13, 1861, 13 D. 578, 23 Scot. Jur. 303.

³ June 5, 1861, 23 D. 933, 33 Scot. Jur. 484.

⁴ June 13, 1871, 9 Macph. 399, 43 Scot. Jur. 150; see also Gray v. Fowlie, March 5, 1847, 9 D. 811, 19 Scot. Jur. 363.

⁵ Bell on Arbitration, secs. 234 and 240.

⁶ Elliot v. The South Devon Railway Co., Jan. 31, 1848, 2 De Gex and Smale's Reps. 17; Drew v. Drew and Leburn, March 1855, 2 Macq. (H. L.) 1.

No. 173. of Session Act, 1868, provided that it was not in future to be a ground of declinature that a Judge was a partner in any joint stock company carrying on the business of fire or life assurance, or held stock as trustee in any incorporated company where either company was a party to a cause before him.¹ That section applied to Judges whether in the Court of Session or in any of the inferior Courts. Arbiters occupied in the eye of the law the same position as inferior Judges.² If the words of that section did not apply to them, at anyrate its spirit did.

July 15, 1887.
Smith v.
Liverpool and
London and Globe Insurance Co.

Argued for the respondent;—(1) The arbiters by drawing lots in appointing an oversman had acted ultra fines mandati, so that the nomination and all that followed ought to be set aside.³ The parties were entitled to have the concurrent judgment of the two arbiters. The arbiters must have knowledge of the business capacities of the oversman, although they need not be personally acquainted with him. The appointment must depend not on chance but on choice,⁴ and there must be an exercise of judgment and will on the part of the arbiters. Mr Brand knew nothing of Mr Lyon, beyond the fact that he was the member of a firm of auctioneers in Edinburgh. He said he would not have chosen Mr Lyon had he been acting alone. That was not enough to satisfy the requirements of the law as laid down in the above cited cases. (2) Mr Lyon had a clear interest in the defenders' Company, sufficient to disqualify him. He was a partner in an unincorporated company, and thus a party to the cause. (3) It was not in the power of the arbiters to waive such a disqualification, and they were bound to come back to the parties before they did so. What was committed to them was to appoint a proper person,—not one who was legally objectionable. (4) Arbiters were not included in the provisions of the 103d section of the Court of Session Act. They were not Judges in any Court in the Kingdom. The disqualification having been removed in the case of Judges, it was thereby impliedly retained in the case of arbiters.

It was stated at the bar that the defenders' Company was not incorporated.

LORD PRESIDENT.—In this case the Lord Ordinary has reduced the award of the oversman on two separate grounds.

The first is that the nomination of the oversman was illegal, in respect that the arbiters, who had the power of nomination, settled the matter by drawing lots and not by exercising their judgment in the selection of the most suitable person. If that were a correct representation of the facts of the case, I should have been of the same opinion with the Lord Ordinary. But it is necessary to look at the precise state of the facts as shewn by the evidence, and I think we have these brought out very clearly in the examination of both arbiters.

Mr Brand, who was the arbiter nominated by the pursuer, states what passed between Mr Mair, who was nominated by the Insurance Company, and himself, and that his own proposal was that a practical man should be made oversman. He did not however stand upon that, but went on further to discuss who would be a ¹ Borthwick v. Scottish Widows' Fund, Feb. 4, 1864, 2 Macph. 595, 36 Scot. Jur. 290; cf. also London and North-Western Railway Co. v. Lindsey, 1858, 3 Macq. 114; Proprietors of Grand Junction Canal v. Dimes, 1852, 3 Clark & H. L. Cases, 759.

² Forbes v. Underwood, Jan. 22, 1886, 13 R. 465.

³ Bell on Arbitration, sec. 347; Russell on the Power and Duty of an Arbitrator (5th edit.), p. 226.

⁴ In re Cassel, 1829, 9 B. & C. 624; Greenwood and Titterington, 1839, 9 Ad. & Ellis' Reps. 699; Ford v. Jones, 1832, 3 B. & Ad. Reps. 248; European & American S.S. Company v. Crosskey, Jan. 27, 1860, 29 L. J. C. P. 155.

proper person to appoint. He says,—“(A.) When I proposed Mr Dowell I said No. 173. that he was a man of long experience, and if he was not able to tell the price of a pair of shoes of a different size, he was clever enough, and had experience enough to get some person in his employment that would be able to do so. I knew what Mr Lyon’s profession was, and what firm he belonged to. I had no objection to him on account of his being an auctioneer. I knew Mr Lyon’s firm by repute, and I knew his son very well. There is no doubt his firm has a good reputation. I said to Mr Mair that I had no objection to Mr Lyon. I said that to him before the names were put into the hat. (Q.) Did you say something of this kind, ‘I suppose he will be all right’? (A.) I don’t think I made such a remark.” On the other hand, Mr Mair says,—“I said, ‘What do you say to Mr William Lyon?’ He said he preferred Mr Dowell. We then had some little talk in regard to that. I said I did not care much whether it was Mr Dowell or Mr Lyon that was appointed, but still after having nominated Mr Lyon, I preferred him. He said the same thing—that having nominated Mr Dowell, he preferred him. After some little talk, I said, ‘Well, seeing that neither of us seem to care which gentleman is appointed, let us put the names into a hat, write two slips of paper, each containing the name of one gentleman, put them into the hat and draw, and whichever of the gentlemen is drawn let him be nominated as oversman.’ That was done, and Mr Lyon was drawn.”

July 15, 1887.
Smith v.
Liverpool and
London and Globe Insurance Co.

It was represented to us by counsel for the pursuer that by the method thus pursued there was a substitution of chance for choice, and that is a very terse and emphatic way of characterising the objection, provided there are facts to support it. But I do not think it can be said there was no choice. There was in point of fact a delectus, not of one person but of two. Both arbiters were agreed that both the persons suggested by them were equally eligible as oversmen, but Mr Brand having originally selected and named the one, and Mr Mair the other, there was a little obstinacy on the part of each as to who should yield. In that condition of matters, the element of chance does come in, but to a very limited extent. What was submitted to chance was the choice between two persons acknowledged to be both equally suitable. That is not a good objection to a nomination. What appears to me to be the common sense view of the case is adopted in two very important cases in the English Courts. They are not binding upon us as precedents, but they commend themselves very thoroughly to my judgment, and I think we should follow them (Neale v. Ledger, 16 East’s Reps. 51, and In re Hopper, L. R., 2 Q. B. 367). It was held in these cases that there was just such an amount of choice and selection as would justify what was done. The result was that a perfectly eligible person, in the opinion of both arbiters, was secured. I cannot, therefore, agree with the Lord Ordinary that this is a good objection.

But there is another objection of a different character, which is very formidable, and indeed conclusive. It turns out that Mr Lyon is a shareholder in the defenders’ Company. It is represented that this gave him a very small interest in the Company—a point which I shall consider immediately. But I should like to say, in the first place, that no moral blame of any kind whatever attaches to Mr Lyon in connection with this matter. He had altogether forgotten the fact of his being a shareholder when he accepted the position of oversman, and when ever it was brought to his recollection he at once communicated it to the arbiters. It is said further that the interest which Mr Lyon had in the Company was so infinitesimally small that it is impossible it could affect his judgment. It was

No. 173.

July 15, 1887.
Smith v.
Liverpool and
London and Globe Insurance
Co.

argued to us that it could not be suggested that his mind could be corrupted for the few shillings difference which a decision in the Company's favour would involve. To say this is, I think, wholly to misapprehend the case. In the position of oversman Mr Lyon became Judge in his own cause. No one is entitled to be that, and if he happens to act in such circumstances, then his judgment is bad. This is quite well settled. The cases of the Aberdeen Bank, 22 D. 162, and of Blaikie's Trustees, 2 Macph. 595, which are cited by the Lord Ordinary, are strong examples, and are precisely in point. The declinatures in these cases were due to the fact that the Judges so declining were members or partners of the society which was one of the litigant parties. In practice, I need hardly say that it has never been doubted that a Judge should not sit in such circumstances. No Judge has ever questioned the binding character of this disqualification. It can of course be obviated by a minute of parties. But this only confirms the view that the disqualification, supported by the decisions to which I have alluded, is in force, and that everyday practice is in conformity with them.

I have had occasion to say that I regretted that these objections have not been removed by statute, and to some extent this has been done by the Court of Session Act of 1868, sec. 103. But this does not apply to the case of oversmen, and, accordingly, so far as regards them, we are just where we were in the case of Blaikie's Trustees. I may add that a very important case occurred in the English Courts where a judgment of Lord Cottenham was called in question (Dimes v. Grand Junction Canal Proprietors, June 29, 1852, 3 Clarke, H. L. Cases, 759), on the ground that one of the litigants in the cause in which he was judging was a company of which he was a member. The question was thought so important that not only was it very fully argued in Court but it was referred to the whole of the English Judges, who returned very elaborate opinions, in accordance with which Lord Cottenham's judgment was set aside. It is contended that the laws of England and Scotland are not the same upon this point. I think they are the same in regard to an objection like the present, where the Judge is a shareholder of a litigant company. The laws of England and Scotland appear to me to be identical as regards this particular objection.

I was very anxious to know whether the Liverpool and London and Globe Insurance Company was incorporated or not. The Act of Sederunt of 1st February 1820 empowers a Judge to act although he may be a member or shareholder of any of the chartered banks who may be a litigant in the process before them. The ground of removal of disqualification in that case is that the litigant party is the corporation, and the corporation is the party to the suit. Where the company is not incorporated, then all the shareholders are parties to the suit, there being no one other than they to represent the company. So that the Act of Sederunt can have no application to an unincorporated company. I am therefore for repelling the first plea in law for the pursuer and sustaining the fourth, and giving decree as craved.

LORD MURE.—On the first point, I am unable to agree with the Lord Ordinary. The position in which, according to the evidence, Messrs Brand and Mair were placed was this, that they both thought either Mr Lyon or Mr Dowell quite well fitted for the duties of oversman, but that each preferred the one he had himself suggested. In these circumstances the English cases which have been cited shew conclusively that it was not illegal for them to cast lots between the two.

On the second point, I have come to the same conclusion as the Lord Ordinary.

It is settled by the cases of the Aberdeen Bank, 22 D. 162, and of Blaikie's No. 173. Trustees, 2 Macph. 595, that anyone holding shares in a public company cannot competently act as Judge in a cause in which that company is concerned. This is a fixed rule, I think, both in England and in Scotland, and must be applied here.

July 15, 1887.
Smith v.
Liverpool and
London and Globe Insurance Co.

LORD SHAND.—I concur with your Lordships upon both points. In regard to the first, I think that a choice was exercised by the arbiters. Both were agreed that either Mr Dowell or Mr Lyon would be a satisfactory selection, and the fact that they settled the matter by casting lots between them to settle which of two eligible men should be oversman cannot affect the validity of the appointment.

As regards the second point, neither of the arbiters was aware when the choice was made that Mr Lyon was a shareholder in the defenders' Company. When this fact was realised, it was at once brought under notice and made the ground of objection. It appears to me that Mr Lyon, as a shareholder, was really engaged in deciding a cause to which he was a party. It is not possible for us to weigh the extent of his interest in the Company. The Court cannot affirm the proposition that if that interest is large he may not act, but if small he may. That might lead to numerous disputes with no standard to which an appeal could be made as to what was or was not a sufficient interest to disqualify. I am of opinion that upon this ground the appointment of Mr Lyon as oversman was bad, and cannot stand.

LORD ADAM.—I am of the same opinion. Both persons for whom the lots were cast were selected as fit for the appointment of oversman. The only question was which of them should be first.

As to the second point, it is of supreme importance that the administration of the law should be pure and unsuspect. Any temporary inconvenience which may arise from the fact that anyone is disqualified by interest from acting as Judge in a particular cause is a minor consideration. I think the circumstance that Mr Lyon was a shareholder in the Insurance Company is conclusive.

THE COURT accordingly recalled the Lord Ordinary's interlocutor of 23d March 1887, in so far as it sustained the reasons of reduction set forth in the first plea in law for the pursuer; quoad ultra refused the reclaiming note, and adhered to said interlocutor in so far as it sustained the reasons of reduction set forth in the fourth plea in law for the pursuer, and reduced, decerned, and declared in terms of the conclusions of the summons, &c.

J. J. DYER, S.S.C.—A. P. PURVES, W.S.—Agents.

REVEREND JAMES BAIN AND OTHERS (Kirk-Session of Duthil, &c.), Pursuers (Reclaimers).—J. C. Thomson—A. J. Young.

No. 174.

COUNTESS-DOWAGER OF SEAFIELD AND ANOTHER, Defenders (Respondents).

—D.-F. Mackintosh—Darling—Maconochie.

PRESBYTERY OF ABERNETHY, Defenders (Respondents).—A. S. D. Thomson.

July 15, 1887.
Bain v. Lady
Seafield.

Church—Excambion of glebe and churchyard—Consent of heritors.—Partial reduction of a deed.—The consent of heritors is not necessary to a contract of excambion of glebe lands.

The minister of a parish, with consent of the Presbytery, excambied the site of the church, the churchyard, and part of the glebe, for other lands belonging to a heritor in the parish.

In an action of reduction subsequently brought by the minister and the kirk-

No. 174. session for reduction of the deed as being null without consent of the heritors, held (1) that in so far as regarded the site of the church and the churchyard, the deed was invalid as granted without the consent of the heritors; (2) that quoad ultra the deed was valid—the pursuer and his successors in the benefice not being prejudiced by its partial reduction, or by the failure of the transaction with regard to the site of the church and the churchyard.

July 15, 1887.
Bain v. Lady
Seafield.

1ST DIVISION.
Lord Kinnear.
B.

BY deed of excambion, dated 3d, 5th, and 6th May 1882, following upon and embodying the terms of a draft minute of agreement, entered into between the Earl of Seafield and the Presbytery of Abernethy, with consent and concurrence of the Rev. James Bain, minister of Duthil, on the narrative “that the said Earl of Seafield sometime ago signified to the said Rev. James Bain his desire to acquire part of the lands forming the glebe of Duthil, lying to the east and north of the churchyard, and extending to about one acre and one-half of an acre, with a view to plant and improve the said ground, which is in the immediate vicinity of the burying-ground of the family of Grant, and the said Rev. James Bain had expressed his readiness, subject to the sanction of the Presbytery of the bounds, and on receiving an equivalent therefor, to concede for the object in view the said parcels of ground, and also that the said Earl should at the same time acquire right to the ground occupied by the church and churchyard of the said parish to the exclusion of the right of the said Rev. James Bain and his successors in the said cure to graze with cattle or sheep the said churchyard,” the Presbytery, with consent of Mr Bain, disposed to Lord Seafield three parcels of the glebe lands of Duthil, as also the ground forming the churchyard of Duthil, and the site of the parish church, &c., together with all right, title, and interest which the Presbytery or Mr Bain or his successors in the said cure had or might claim thereto in all time coming. Lord Seafield, on his part, disposed to the Presbytery three acres of ground.

The excambion originated in a desire on the part of Lord Seafield to have the churchyard and the burying-place of the family improved.

Mr Bain and the kirk-session of the parish now sought to have the minute of agreement and the deed of excambion reduced. They called as defenders the Countess-Dowager of Seafield, who succeeded to the family estates on the death of her son, Lord Seafield, in 1884, the Presbytery of Abernethy, and Sir John P. Grant of Rothiemurchus and Lady Seafield as the two heritors of the parish.

The pursuers pleaded;—(1) The said agreement and contract of excambion fall to be reduced, in respect it was ultra vires of the parties thereto to have entered into the same. (2) In respect the said contract of excambion conveyed to the said Earl of Seafield the site of the church and churchyard of the parish of Duthil, the same falls to be reduced.

In answer to the first and second pleas Lady Seafield stated,—“In accepting a conveyance of the site of the church and churchyard Lord Seafield distinctly understood that it conveyed no right of property therein, but merely imposed upon him the responsibility of keeping the churchyard in order; and he never made, nor does the defender make, any claim under the conveyance. In estimating the land to be given in exchange to the minister, the extent of the church and churchyard, and also of the site of the public road, was included in the amount conveyed to Lord Seafield, and land of an equal amount was conveyed to the minister, Lord Seafield’s desire being that the minister should get full value for the ground taken from the glebe. The minister thus profited by the extent of the churchyard and site of the church being included. Neither the site of the church nor the churchyard has ever in any way been interfered with by the defender, except that she has assumed the burden of keeping the churchyard in order; but she has never claimed or exercised any right of property over either the one or the other. She is quite willing and hereby offers to renounce any right purporting to be conveyed by the contract in or to the site of the church and churchyard, and to execute any deed which may be necessary to give effect thereto."

No. 174.

July 15, 1887.
Bain v. Lady
Seafield.

Lady Seafield pleaded that the pursuers' statements were irrelevant.

The Presbytery of Abernethy pleaded;—The present defenders assuming, but not admitting, the relevancy of the averments of the pursuers and their title and interest to sue, and that the pursuer the Rev. James Bain is not barred personali exceptione from challenging the deeds sought to be reduced, plead that, as the arrangement contained in the said deeds has been and will be beneficial to the minister and his successors in office, and to the benefice generally, the decree of reduction concluded for should not be pronounced.

The heritors did not appear.

The Lord Ordinary (Kinnear), on 29th March 1887, pronounced this interlocutor:—"Finds that the contract and deed of excambion libelled, in so far as it purports to convey to the late Earl of Seafield the ground forming the churchyard of Duthil, and the site of the parish church thereof, or any right, title, or interest which the Presbytery of Abernethy or the minister of the parish of Duthil have in the said church or churchyard, was ultra vires of the said minister and Presbytery, and was and is invalid and ineffectual; and to this extent and effect finds, declares, and reduces in terms of the conclusions of the summons: Finds that, in other respects, the said excambion is valid and effectual to the parties; and, except to the extent and effect aforesaid, assoilzies the defenders, and decerns: Finds the defenders entitled to expenses."*

* "OPINION.—There can be no doubt that the excambion in question is invalid and ineffectual in so far as it purports to convey the churchyard and the site of the church to the late Earl of Seafield. But the defender avers that it never was intended to give the Earl a right of property in these subjects, but merely to subject him to the burden of keeping the churchyard in order; that she has neither exercised nor asserted any right of property in either the church or churchyard, and that she is ready to renounce any right in either which may be conveyed to her by the deed of excambion, and to execute any deed which may be necessary for that purpose.

"The only question, therefore, is whether the conveyance of the church and churchyard is to be considered as a mere error in conveyancing, which may be set right without affecting the subsistence or validity of the excambion in any essential respect, or whether the contract must be reduced in toto as being altogether illegal and ineffectual.

"The pursuer maintains that the excambion must be reduced in toto, on two grounds—first, because, independently of the attempted conveyance of the churchyard, the sanction of the body of heritors, as well as of the Presbytery, is essential to the validity of an excambion of a glebe in whole or in part; and secondly, because, if the conveyance of the churchyard is illegal, the entire conveyance and the contract upon which it proceeds must be set aside.

"There is no authority, so far as I know, in support of the first of these propositions. The heritors are the proper administrators of the churchyard, and there can be no effectual excambion of any part of it to which they are not parties. But they have no similar title or interest in the glebe. They are not the guardians of the benefice, and if the interests of the benefice are adequately represented by the minister in the cure and the Presbytery of the bounds, there appears to me to be no ground in law for setting aside an excambion of the glebe, otherwise unobjectionable, merely because the heritors as a body have not been parties to the transaction. Such excambions have not been uncommon,

No. 174. The pursuers reclaimed, and argued;—(1) The sanction of the heritors was as necessary to the excambion of the glebe as it was to that of the church and churchyard.¹ (2) The contract of excambion must stand or fall as a whole. It was admittedly invalid in regard to the church and churchyard. It could not therefore stand quoad the glebe. (3) The averments of essential error and misrepresentation were relevant to send to proof.

July 15, 1887.
Bain v. Lady
Seafield.

The respondents argued (1) that the sanction of the heritors was not necessary to an excambion of the glebe; it was sufficient if the minister and the Presbytery, whose duty it was to guard the interests of the benefice, were consenting parties to the deed. There was no authority to a contrary effect, and excambions entered into by those parties had frequently been given effect to by the Court.²

and it does not appear either from the decisions or the text-books that the consent of the heritors has ever been thought essential to their validity. It may be that the heritors other than the heritor with whom the excambion is made may have an interest to challenge a transaction which they conceive to be prejudicial to themselves or to the benefice. But a challenge on that ground must be based upon the fact of prejudice. In the present case the heritors make no complaints, and it is not suggested that they have any reason to complain. It does not appear to me that the pursuer can have any title to plead their absence as a ground for reducing an excambion to which he himself was party, with the sanction of the Presbytery of the bounds.

"The second proposition appears to me to be equally untenable. If Lord Seafield had bargained for a right of property in the churchyard, he and his representatives would have been entitled to plead that the contract must either be reduced altogether or affirmed in all its terms. But the defender does not claim to have any proprietary right in the churchyard, and is ready to renounce all such right as may appear to have been given to her by the terms of the conveyance, without demanding in return the restoration of any part of the land given by the late Earl in exchange for the glebe land which she desires to retain. The pursuer and his successors in the benefice are in no way prejudiced by the partial reduction of the excambion or by the failure of the transaction with regard to the churchyard. If he were to lose by the reduction any part of the consideration given to him or the benefice in exchange for his glebe land, he might be justified in demanding that the whole transaction should be set aside. But he loses nothing. The Presbytery is satisfied that the excambion is for the advantage of the benefice, and the only consequence of the churchyard having been taken into account would appear to be that it is more advantageous than it would have been otherwise. The case of Hart v. Stewart's Trustees, 3 R. 192, upon which the pursuer relies, appears to me to be inapplicable. It was held to be incompetent to make a new contract for the parties by substituting terms which might appear to the Court to be reasonable for the terms which were actually stipulated but under essential error. But in the present case it is not proposed to make a new contract. The defender is in possession of land under a conveyance which is in part ineffectual, because the minister and Presbytery have no power to convey the churchyard, but in other respects valid, because they have power to excamb glebe land. She is ready to renounce the right which she admits to be ineffectual. But it does not follow that she must also abandon the valid right which the minister and Presbytery had full power to grant, and for which she has given an adequate consideration."

¹ Duncan's Parochial Law, 531; Dalrymple v. Callender (Cranstoun Manse), July 11, 1827, 9 S. 935.

² Erskine's Inst. ii. 10, 61; Connell's Parochial Law, p. 428—see also Supplement, p. 97; Duncan's Par. Law, 528-533; Bremner v. Officers of State, June 29, 1831, 9 S. 838; Stewart v. Lord Glenlyon, May 20, 1835, 13 S. 787; Lockerby v. Stirling, June 25, 1835, 13 S. 978; M'Callum v. Grant, March 4,

LORD PRESIDENT.—I am of opinion that the Lord Ordinary has rightly disposed of this case. I had previously (Bain v. Lady Seafield, 12 R. 62) occasion to express my opinion that the contract and deed of excambion libelled on was to some extent illegal and invalid, as being ultra vires of the parties who conveyed, and that has been given effect to by the Lord Ordinary. But it is now contended by the pursuers, in the first place, that the Lord Ordinary's judgment does not go far enough, and that the contract should be held invalid in all respects in respect of the invalidity of part of it. Now, I can quite well understand that if the party in whose favour a stipulation is made finds that he cannot maintain it, and that consequently the consideration fails on account of which he undertook the obligation, it is reasonable for him to hold that the deed must go, on the ground that the consideration being removed the obligation no longer remains effectual. Accordingly that would have been a plausible position for the Countess of Seafield to have taken up, the position, namely, that as she could not get the ground of the churchyard and the site of the church she was no longer bound by the contract. But that is not the state of matters, for the Rev. James Bain's position is the reverse of all that. He loses nothing whatever by the judgment of the Lord Ordinary. As the Lord Ordinary has pointed out, he gains by the transaction. The churchyard and the site of the church are restored to the proper possessors, as being the property of the heritors of the parish in trust for the parishioners. It was part of his duty to defend these grounds from any encroachment, and to see that they were used for the proper purposes. Now, he has succeeded in restoring these matters to their proper legal position, so far at least as the site of the church and the churchyard are concerned. It is clear that he has given less consideration, as matters now stand, than under the original stipulation, and yet he retains everything that he stipulated for. And accordingly he cannot maintain that because part is illegal he shall be entitled to cut down that part of the contract which is perfectly legal.

No. 174.

July 15, 1887.
Bain v. Lady Seafield.

It is said further that there is an intrinsic nullity in the deed, because it was not consented to by the heritors, and this objection is directed to that part of the contract which excambes a portion of the glebe. The pursuers were asked to give their authority for that proposition, but none was produced. On the contrary, it has been shewn by the respondents that there have been many occasions on which contracts of excambion have been made with consent of the Presbytery and without the sanction of the heritors. The question perhaps may not have been directly raised, but if the objection had been tenable, it would have been stated. The fact remains that in a considerable number of instances the contracts passed without challenge. This plea therefore also entirely fails.

LORD MURE, LORD SHAND, and LORD ADAM concurred.

THE COURT adhered.

GORDON, PRINGLE, DALLAS, & Co., W.S.—MACKENZIE, INNES, & LOGAN, W.S.—Agents.

1826, 4 S. 527—see Lord Glenlee's opinion; Dalrymple v. Callander, July 11, 1827, 9 S. 935—see Sess. Papers.

No. 175.

July 16, 1887.
 Guild v. Glasgow Educational Endowments Board.

JAMES WYLLIE GUILD (Macmillan's Judicial Factor), Petitioner (Reclaimer)—D.-F. Mackintosh—Davidson.

GLASGOW CITY EDUCATIONAL ENDOWMENTS BOARD, Respondents.—
Murray—Dickson.

Judicial Factor—Investment of trust-funds—Loan over buildings in course of erection.—Buildings in course of erection are not a security on which a judicial factor is entitled to lend trust-funds.

Circumstances in which a judicial factor was held liable to make good a loss of trust-funds arising out of a loan over subjects in course of building, which afterwards proved insufficient to meet it.

1st Division.
 Lord Trayner.
 B.

JAMES WYLLIE GUILD, C.A., was judicial factor upon the executry estate of the late Michael Macmillan, which, in terms of a scheme drawn up by the Commissioners under the Educational Endowments (Scotland) Act, 1882, fell to be handed over to the Glasgow City Educational Endowments Board.

Before making over the estate Mr Guild applied to the Court of Session for authority to denude, and for exoneration and discharge.

The estate in the factor's hands amounted to about £16,000, and it appeared upon the report of Mr Molleson, C.A., to whom the Lord Ordinary (Trayner) remitted the factor's accounts, that there had been a loss to the estate upon, inter alia, an investment of £2000, and that the Educational Endowments Board objected to the factor taking credit therefor in his accounts.

The £2000 loan was made in 1878 over subjects in Burnbank Gardens, Glasgow, then in course of erection. The facts in regard to the investment are set forth in the Lord Ordinary's opinion, infra.

The Lord Ordinary (Trayner), on 25th January 1887, found that the petitioner was not entitled to take credit for the £2000, and of new remitted to Mr Molleson to give effect to that finding, and report.*

* "OPINION.—. . . . 2. In this case, the loan was given over subjects still in the course of erection. They were estimated by an architect in November 1877 as at the value of £3250 'when completed,' over and above ground-annual and feu-duty. The buildings, when completed, were intended to be dwelling-houses with 'a set of private stable offices,' and the estimated annual rental of the whole was £260. On 20th February 1878, the architect certified that £1200 of the loan might be paid to account, and that was paid, the balance of the loan, £800, being deposited in bank to await the requirements of the building. Shortly thereafter the borrower failed, leaving the subjects unfinished and the feu-duty in arrear. Mr Molleson reports that 'the judicial factor thereafter expended the £800 balance in completing, as far as possible, the subjects, but this was insufficient to erect a portion of the buildings intended for stables, &c., estimated to produce one-fourth of the whole rental. The free rents from the property have been insufficient to meet the interest at 4½ per cent in the bond by £424, 7s. 9d., being the amount of interest in arrear at 20th June 1886.'

"In this case, I think, the investment was one which the judicial factor had no authority to make. It is no doubt the fact that money is often lent on the security of buildings still in the course of erection, but persons who make such loans take the risk upon themselves of the building ever being completed, and of its value when completed being such as to make their security sufficient. No objection can be taken to persons who thus risk their own money, but a judicial factor is not in that position. He is managing the property of others, and his first duty is to take care that (so far as acts of management go) nothing shall be done to endanger the safety of the estate, or to diminish its amount. No

Leave having been granted the petitioner reclaimed, and thereafter lodged a minute, in which, inter alia, he offered to prove “(1) That the investment for which he has been found not entitled to take credit was a loan over subjects of a high class in a favourable locality, and which have been fully occupied ever since they were completed, at a rental of £155. . . . (3) That the tenement which was actually completed with the said £800, and which formed the principal portion of the said buildings, was at the time of the loan, and also at the date of its completion, namely, in December 1878, and in the then condition of the property market, of the value of £3000 or thereby, and formed a good security for a loan of £2000. . . . (5) That the loss to the estate on the aforesaid investment was the result of an unprecedented fall in the value of house property in Glasgow and the west of Scotland generally, and was not due to negligence or want of proper care on the part of the factor.”

No. 175.
July 16, 1887.
Guild v. Glasgow Educational Endowments Board.

The Court, on 26th February following, remitted the minute to Mr Molleson to inquire, and report. Mr Molleson having reported,* the case was further heard on 16th July following.

speculation is admissible even for the benefit of the estate. In this case, the investment was a speculation, and unfortunately it failed.

“I come to the conclusion that the factor must make good to the estate the loss arising out of this transaction, a conclusion which I regret, because I do not doubt that the factor did what he thought was best for the estate. Accordingly, I find that the factor is not entitled to take credit in his accounts for the sum now in question. This will make the factor debtor to the estate in £2000, with interest thereon at 4 per cent, under deduction of any interest received out of which the estate has had the benefit.

“I will allow the expenses of both parties out of the estate.”

* “(1) The property I found to be situated close to the ‘Great Western Road,’ a busy middle class thoroughfare, and not far distant from the West End Park. ‘Burnbank Gardens’ is a square of good self-contained houses, with a considerable garden or pleasure-ground in the centre. The buildings in question are situated at the corner of one of the openings into ‘Burnbank Gardens,’ some of the windows looking into the gardens and some into the street leading into it. The tenement consists of a main-door house with area flat, having right of access to the pleasure-grounds, and the two houses above, entering by a common stair, the upper having an attic flat. The tenement presents a substantial and genteel appearance, the rents received being £55, £45, and £55. These rents are very considerably less than would be obtained for a similar class of houses in Edinburgh, doubtless arising from there being a larger number of such houses in Glasgow than the requirements of the population demand. In connection with the rental it is proper to draw attention to an unfavourable feature in the security, namely, the ground-annual of £53. This of course remains the same when rents fall, and presses more severely in the absence of the completion of the stables, forming part of the proposal upon which the advance was made, a rental of £60 having been reported as derivable therefrom. . . . (3) The loan was made on 22d February 1878, £1200 having been paid to the builder and £800 consigned. No evidence remains to shew the cost which had been put out on the property at that time, whether £1200, more or less, had been expended, and it must now be a matter of conjecture whether the subjects were in 1878 worth £3000. Mr Thomson, the architect, however, remains of opinion that the property formed a good security for £2000 at the date of the transaction being entered into. Evidence exists of the stage towards completion of the building at or about the time of the loan being made, and this may be of importance in assisting your Lordships to dispose of the case. The loan was made on 22d February 1878 to the borrower, Philips. I learned Philips was a builder in a large way, having built about two-thirds of the whole of Burnbank Gardens. He appears shortly after the

No. 175. LORD PRESIDENT.—In this case I have no hesitation in agreeing with the Lord Ordinary. This is not a kind of investment which a judicial factor or any one in a fiduciary capacity is entitled to make. To give an advance on a building in course of erection is to lend upon no security at all, because the subject on which the advance is made is not in existence. It is to be brought into existence by means of the loan. The investment is purely speculative, and is one which it is quite beyond the powers of a factor to make.

LORD MURE concurred.

LORD SHAND.—I am very clearly of the same opinion. A judicial factor in charge of trust-funds knows that there are certain securities which are sanctioned and recognised, and to which he must limit himself in investing the funds under his charge. A loan which is made on house property to be built,—the money being advanced in instalments according as the building progresses,—is a purely speculative transaction. The builder may fail,—new contracts have to be made, to which the factor must be a party,—or the funds may turn out to be insufficient, and the building never be completed, as has been the case in the present instance. These are merely illustrations of the dangers which attend such securities. Trust-funds in the hands of a factor cannot be subjected to risks of this sort. The factor made an urgent appeal for inquiry on the point which he offered to prove, that the buildings when he made the advance of £1200 were really worth £3000, and could have been sold for that sum. This has not been substantiated, and it has not been shewn that this case can be treated as an exception to the rule which forbids the investment of trust-funds upon such transactions, which involve speculative risks which cannot occur in the case of buildings completed and occupied, and so yielding a present return.

LORD ADAM concurred.

THE COURT adhered.

FODD, SIMPSON, & MARWICK, W.S.—WEBSTER, WILL, & RITCHIE, S.S.C.—Agents.

above date to have been consulting his law-agents, Messrs W. E. and A. J. Annan, and a meeting of his creditors was held on 27th May 1878. Mr Thomson, the architect, who originally valued for the loan, gives a report, dated 9th May 1877, where he states,—‘When the £1200 was paid the building was roofed and all first coated, the plasterers pushing on the finishing of their work in the upper flats.’ This statement is borne out thus. It is probable that in Philips’ the borrower’s, then financial state, much work would not be done in the short period elapsing between his obtaining the loan and meeting his creditors. After some little negotiations, the creditors declined to take up the property, and abandoned it to the bondholder. . . . It would thus appear that when the loan was made and the security fell back into the judicial factor’s hands, the tenement was finished so far as masons and slaters were concerned, but all the internal fittings and such work had to be done, and to do so quite exhausted the £800 retained. . . . (5) This is a point hardly needing inquiry. It is a matter of notoriety that the stoppage of the City of Glasgow Bank in October 1878 was followed by a collapse of the inflated condition of the house property market in Glasgow that had existed prior thereto, as well as by a serious and long-lasting depression.”

THE GLASGOW PROVIDENT INVESTMENT SOCIETY, Pursuers (Respondents). No. 176.

—Pearson—Ure.

THE WESTMINSTER FIRE OFFICE, Defenders (Reclaimers).—

Balfour—Murray.

July 16, 1887.*
Glasgow Provident Investment Society v. Westminster Fire Office.

Fire insurance—Right of postponed bondholder to recover when prior bondholder has received a sum sufficient to reinstate.—The proprietor of mills (which with the site were at least of the value of £10,000) granted bonds over them for £9000, and subsequently a postponed bond to another creditor for £900. Policies of fire insurance for £7000 were taken in name of the prior bondholders for behoof of themselves and of the owner in reversion. The postponed bondholder, an investment society, took a policy of fire insurance from another company for £900 in name of the society and of the owner "in reversion." The policy insured against damage by fire "the property described on the margin hereof." On the margin were set forth various items forming parts of the mills and machinery, with the specific sum insured on each. The owner paid the premiums of insurance.

A fire occurred, which damaged the mills and stopped the works. The holders of the prior bonds obtained under their policies of insurance the sum of £5668, which was sufficient to reinstate the works, but they applied it in reduction of their debt.

Subsequently the investment society raised an action, with consent and concurrence of the owner, against their insurers for declarator that the pursuers were entitled to be indemnified by the defenders against the loss they had sustained by the fire, and for payment. The defenders denied liability, on the ground that the loss caused by the fire had already been made good to the prior bondholders and the owner. It was admitted that at the date of the fire the subjects were of sufficient value to cover all the bonds, and that after the fire the subjects were not of sufficient value to meet the prior bonds.

Held (by a majority of the whole Court, consisting of the Lord President, the Lord Justice-Clerk, Lord Shand, Lord Craighill, Lord Adam, Lord Lee, Lord Fraser, Lord Kinnear, and Lord McLaren, diss. Lord Mure, Lord Young, Lord Rutherford Clark, and Lord Trayner) that the defenders were bound under their contract to indemnify the investment society for the loss it had sustained by the fire.

Observed that the investment society, after receiving payment of the indemnity, would not be entitled either to recover the whole sum in the bond for their own benefit, or to give their debtor the benefit of their insurance by discharging any part of his debt, but were bound to give the insurers the benefit, for their relief, of such portion of their claim as had been satisfied by payment of the indemnity.

(See Scottish Amicable Heritable Securities Association v. Northern Assurance Company, Dec. 11, 1883, 11 R. 287.)

Messrs Hay Brothers, the proprietors of the property in Glasgow known as the Greenhead Grain Mills, consisting of a site with grain mills and machinery thereon, borrowed certain sums of money from the Scottish Amicable Heritable Securities Association, Limited, James Alexander Robertson, The Glasgow Provident Investment Society, and Thomas Wiseman & Co., and in security granted bonds and dispositions in security over the mills, &c., which were of priority and preference according to the above order of the names. To insure the premises against fire the following policies were taken out:—(1) With the Northern Assurance Company for £3165; (2) with the Edinburgh Fire Insurance Company for £2210; (3) with the West of England Fire and Life Insurance Company for £1610; (4) with the Norwich Union Fire Insurance Society for £500; (5) with the Westminster Fire Office for £900; (6) with the City of London Fire Company for £500; and (7) with the Fire Insurance Association for £500. Of these policies, Nos. 1, 2, and 3 were taken in name of the Heritable Securities Association as heritable creditors primo loco and Messrs Hay

2D DIVISION.
(Whole Court)
Lord McLaren.
I.

No. 176. in reversion. No. 4 was in name of James Alexander Robertson as heritable creditor and Messrs Hay in reversion, Robertson being in reality trustee for the Heritable Securities Association, and the total amount of the debt due by the Hays to the Association being about £9000. No. 5 was in name of the Glasgow Provident Investment Society of Glasgow and the Hays in reversion. Nos. 6 and 7 were in name of Thomas Wiseman & Co. primo loco and the Hays in reversion, but they applied only to machinery not insured under No. 5.

July 16, 1887.
Glasgow Provident Investment Society v. Westminster Fire Office.

On 1st August 1882 a fire occurred in the mills, and the business previously carried on there was stopped.

The Scottish Amicable Heritable Securities Association and James Alexander Robertson, with consent and concurrence of the Messrs Hay, thereupon raised an action against the insurance companies with which the policies Nos. 1 to 4 inclusive were effected, concluding for payment of the sum of £6500, or such other sum, more or less, as should be found to be the damage occasioned by the fire.

These companies defended the action, and pleaded that the other three offices interested in the policies Nos. 5 to 7 should be made parties to the suit, and that they, the defenders, should not be found liable to pay more than their rateable contribution on the total loss by the fire. This plea was repelled by the Lord Ordinary (M'Laren), and, on a reclaiming note, by the Second Division (Lord Young dissenting)—Scottish Amicable Heritable Securities Association v. Northern Assurance Company, Dec. 11, 1883. 11 R. 287. The defenders also offered to reinstate, and in this the other three offices would have joined, but it was held by the majority of the Court that this offer was made too late. The defenders then proceeded to arbitration with the pursuers, in order to fix the amount of the damage occasioned by the fire. The oversman found that the damage amounted to £5668, 16s. 8d., and for that sum the pursuers got decree. This sum with interest was applied by the pursuers towards payment of the amount contained in their preferable bonds.

The present action was raised on 4th March 1885 by the Glasgow Provident Investment Society, with consent and concurrence of the Messrs Hay, against the Westminster Fire Office, and concluded for declarator that the defenders were "bound to indemnify the pursuers for the loss sustained by them through the destruction by fire of the premises, machinery, and others belonging to" the Hays, "and known as the Greenhead Grain Mills, Bridgeton, Glasgow, and upon which the pursuers had effected an insurance with the defenders"; and for decree ordaining the defenders "to reinstate and replace the said premises, machinery, and others in the condition in which they were immediately prior to the 1st August 1882; or otherwise, to make payment to the pursuers, The Glasgow Provident Investment Society, of the sum of £565 sterling, or of such other sum, less or more, as shall be found, in the course of the proceedings to follow hereon, to be the amount of the said loss."

The policy upon which the pursuers founded was dated 13th October 1881, and was in the following terms:—"This policy of insurance witnesseth that The Glasgow Provident Investment Society of Glasgow and William Home Hay, John James Hay, and Robert Hunter Hay, of Glasgow, grain millers, jointly and severally in reversion, hereinafter called the insured, having paid to 'The Westminster Fire Office' * [for the insurance of houses and other buildings, rents, goods, and other property, from loss or damage by fire], hereinafter called the Society, the sum of £10, 2s.

* The words enclosed within brackets were a marginal addition, marked for insertion as printed.

3d. for insuring against loss or damage by fire, as hereinafter mentioned, No. 176. the property described in the margin hereof, the Society hereby agrees with the insured (but subject to the conditions at foot, which are to be taken as part of this policy), that if the said property, or any part thereof, shall be destroyed or damaged by fire at any time between the 11th day of October 1881 and the 11th day of November 1882, both inclusive, or at any time afterwards, so long as the insured or their representatives in interest shall pay to the Society, and it shall accept the sum required for the renewal of this policy, on or before the 11th day of November in each succeeding year, the Society will, out of its funds and property, in accordance with the rules and regulations of the Society, subject to which this insurance is made and granted, pay or make good all such loss or damage, to an amount not exceeding, in respect of the several matters described in the margin hereof, the sum set opposite thereto respectively, and not exceeding in the whole the sum of £900.—In witness whereof," &c.

July 16, 1887.
Glasgow Pro-
vident Investment Society
v. Westminster Fire
Office.

The property described in the margin consisted of various buildings, &c., fourteen in all, set forth by detailed description, with the sum applicable to each set opposite to each, the whole being headed,—“On the following property forming the ‘Greenhead Grain Mills,’ situate Nos. 95 to 113 James Street, Bridgeton, Glasgow, as afterwards more particularly described, viz.”

The conditions at the foot of the policy included the following:—“7. The Society may, if it think fit, reinstate or replace property damaged or destroyed, instead of paying the amount of the loss or damage, and may join with any other society or insurers in so doing in cases where the property is also insured elsewhere. 9. If, at the time of any loss and damage by fire happening to any property hereby insured, there be any other subsisting insurance or insurances, whether effected by the insured or by any other person, covering the same property, this Society shall not be liable to pay or contribute more than its rateable proportion of such loss or damage. 10. In all cases where any other subsisting insurance or insurances, whether effected by the insured or by any other person, covering any property hereby insured, either exclusively or together with any other property, in and subject to the same risk only, shall be subject to average, the insurance on such property under this policy shall be subject to average in like manner.”

The following note was also endorsed on the policy:—“This office, in case of fire, will only be liable for the payment of rent for such portion of the said term of one year as the aforesaid buildings respectively may be actually untenanted in consequence of fire.”

The pursuers, after referring to their bond and policy and to the fire, averred,—(Cond. 4) “In particular, the subjects and others undernamed were damaged by the said fire to the extent after mentioned, being the amount to which they were respectively insured under the said policy, namely,—

Barley mill and counting-house,	.	.	£190	0	0
One year's rent thereof,	.	.	120	0	0
Steam-boiler house,	.	.	80	0	0
One year's rent thereof,	.	.	10	0	0
Steam-boiler and connections,	.	.	80	0	0
Smith's shop and furnishing store,	.	.	30	0	0
One year's rent thereof,	.	.	5	0	0
Steam-engine and appurtenances,	.	.	50	0	0

In all, . £565 0 0”

* These conditions are correctly quoted from the policy sued on. The quotation at p. 964 is taken from a later form of policy, copies of which had been inadvertently used and laid before the Judges as copies of the policy sued on.

No. 176.

July 16, 1887.
Glasgow Pro-
vident Investment Society
v. Westminster Fire
Office.

The pursuers admitted that the £5 had been paid by the defenders.

They stated further, with reference to the defenders' statement of facts, that the sum of £5668, 16s. 8d. paid by the defenders to the prior bondholders was considerably less than the true amount of the damage done by the fire to the security subjects.

The defenders admitted that the sums specified were the sums for which the various items mentioned were insured, and that loss was suffered through the fire on the first two items to an extent exceeding the amounts insured. Quoad ultra they denied the statements in cond. 4, and explained that no damage was done to the steam-boiler house, and that with regard to the steam-boiler and connections, the furnishing store, and the steam-engine and appurtenances, the damage caused by the fire did not exceed the sums of £15, £9, 10s., and £20 respectively.

The defenders in their statement of facts further averred,—(Stat. 3) "In the event of the defenders paying to the pursuers the sum sued for, the defenders claim right to require from the first pursuers an assignation to the bond and disposition in security, and bond of corroboration, held by them from the second pursuers, over the property in question, but postponed to the balance due to them under said bond, after deducting the payment that may be made to them by the defenders under their fire policy; and the defenders, in any event, claim right to require from the second or concurring pursuers an assignation of all right competent to them under the foresaid Westminster policy." (Stat. 4) "The said sum of £5668, 16s. 8d. is less than the sums contained in the bonds of the said Heritable Securities Association and James Alexander Robertson, which amounted to £9000. The amounts allowed to them in respect of the damage to the buildings and machinery, and the loss of the rents insured by the pursuers in the present action, are less than the amounts insured on the same items by said preferable bondholders. In these circumstances, the full amount of loss and damage caused by the fire, except the rent of the smith's shop and furnishing store, which has been paid to the pursuers, falls to be paid to creditors preferable to the pursuers; and, there being no reversion, the leading pursuers have not, and never had, any insurable interest, and have not been damaged by the occurrence of the fire, except to the extent of £5, above stated."

The pursuers pleaded;—(1) In respect of the contract of insurance founded on, the defenders are liable to make good the loss sustained by the pursuers in the premises. (2) The subjects insured having been damaged by fire to the amount concluded for, the pursuers should have decree, in terms of the conclusions of the summons.

The defenders pleaded;—(1) The statements of the pursuers are irrelevant, and insufficient in law to support the conclusions of the summons. (2) In the circumstances disclosed, the pursuers, having had no insurable interest, and having suffered no damage from the fire (except to the extent of £5 above mentioned), cannot recover any further sums in respect of the policy sued on. (3) In the event of the defenders making payment to the pursuers, or either of them, of the amount sued for, the defenders will be entitled to an assignation, as set forth in article 3 of the defenders' statement, seeing that a larger sum than the total value of the subjects destroyed or damaged by the fire cannot be got by Messrs Hay in respect of the fire, either in payments to their creditors or to themselves.

The parole evidence, which was entirely that of witnesses adduced by the pursuers, was mainly directed to the question of the comparative value of the subjects after the fire as old materials, and as materials to be used in the restoration of the mills. The details of the evidence on this point sufficiently appear from the argument of the parties, infra, pp. 957- 8 and 961. No. 176.

A joint minute was also lodged, in which the pursuers "admitted that the amount found due and paid to The Scottish Amicable Heritable Securities Association, Limited, in their action against The Northern Assurance Company and Others was sufficient for the reinstatement of the subjects destroyed by fire"; and the defenders "admitted that the present defenders were willing to contribute with the defenders in said action to the expense of reinstating the subjects damaged by the fire, or to contribute towards payment of the loss as the same should be ascertained, provided such contribution was held as full payment by them of all sums due by them in respect of the policy issued by them."

July 16, 1887.
Glasgow Provident Investment Society v. Westminster Fire Office.

Mr R. H. Hay, one of the firm of Hay Brothers, gave this evidence:—"The premiums upon the policy now in question were paid by the manager of the Provident Society, and were put to our debit in the account. In short, the money ultimately came out of our pocket. The manager of the Provident Society effected the policy and arranged for it. He got the particulars from us. The principle upon which the £190 for the barley mill and counting-house was arrived at was this, that the interest of the Society was to be insured, and the amount was divided over the different subjects. It would be allocated rateably over the subjects. We gave the rateable allocations. (Q.) Did you not put in the £190 because, except to the extent of £190, the value of the building was covered by other insurances? (A.) Not exactly. It may have been an element in our mind. We had valuations. . . . (Q.) Did you wish to make that an effective insurance by putting it upon what was not already covered? (A.) We distributed it over the subjects. (Q.) Was not your aim to make it an effective insurance, by putting it upon what was not already covered? (A.) I do not know."

On 10th November 1885 the Lord Ordinary (M'Laren) pronounced this interlocutor:—"Finds (first) that the pursuers have sustained damage by fire to the extent of £565, being within the limit of the sum in the policy libelled: Finds (second) that the pursuers have not been indemnified for the said damage, or reinstated in the subjects insured against fire, and that they do not hold the obligation of any other company or person for such indemnification or reinstatement: Finds (third) that the defenders, by the policy of assurance libelled, have undertaken to indemnify

* Appendix A contained a "Tabulated statement of sum insured, claimed, and paid, &c., under the various policies over the Greenhead Grain Mills, Glasgow," which was admitted by both parties. The following are the details bearing on the present question:—

Description of Property Insured.	Amount Insured with 7 Companies.	Statement of Loss against 7 Companies.	Amount Insured with 4 Companies.	Statement of Claim against 7 Companies.	Statement of Claim against 4 Companies.	Valuation by Insur. Companies or by Chinkhill.	Allowance by Overman.	Claim in present Action.
	£ s. d.	£ s. d.	£ s. d.	£ s. d.	£ s. d.	£ s. d.	£ s. d.	£ s. d.
1 Building of Mill, . .	2300 0 0	1724 5 5	2300 0 0	1724 5 5	1724 5 5	1373 12 1	1610 0 0	190 0 0
2 Rent thereof, . . .	553 6 8	553 6 8	433 6 8	553 6 8	433 6 8	...	350 0 0	120 0 0
9 Steam-Engine and Foundations, . . .	350 0 0	10 0 0	300 0 0	10 0 0	300 0 0	...	20 0 0	50 0 0
14 Building of Steam-Boller House, . . .	110 0 0	3 11 1	30 0 0	3 11 1	3 11 1	2 0 0	...	80 0 0
15 Rent thereof, . . .	10 0 0	10 0 0	...	10 0 0	10 0 0
16 Steam-Boller and Connections, . . .	105 0 0	3 0 0	25 0 0	3 0 0	25 0 0	...	15 0 0	80 0 0
17 Building of Store adjoining Boller, . . .	50 0 0	10 15 5	20 0 0	10 15 5	20 0 0	7 18 6	9 10 0	30 0 0
18 Rent thereof, . . .	5 0 0	5 0 0	...	5 0 0	5 0 0
Totals (including the omitted items), . .	9255 0 0	6344 3 5	7485 0 0	6227 9 10	6221 2 11	...	5468 16 8	565 0 0

No. 176. the pursuers against such damage ; therefore decerns against the defenders in terms of the conclusion for payment of the said sum of £565, under deduction of the sum of £5 already paid, with interest as concluded for: Finds the pursuers entitled to expenses," &c.*

July 16, 1887.
Glasgow Provident Investment Society
v. Westminster Fire Office.

* "OPINION.—The pursuers are creditors in a postponed bond over the mills and machinery of Messrs Hay Brothers, Bridgeton, Glasgow, which were injured by fire on 1st August 1882. This is the second action which has arisen out of this occurrence. The previous action was instituted by the preferable bondholders against four companies, with whom they had effected insurances, and in it they claimed indemnification for the diminished value of their securities resulting from the fire damage. The case was heard by me, and afterwards by the Second Division of the Court, and we held that the preferable bondholders were entitled to recover the full amount of the fire damage, the companies not having elected to indemnify by reinstatement under the powers to that effect contained in the policies.

"In that action a plea was stated by the defenders, to the effect that the Westminster Fire Office (the present defenders) were bound to make a contribution towards the indemnification of the first bondholders ; but this plea was rejected by a majority of the Court, on the plain ground that the insurance policy issued by the Westminster Fire Office was a policy effected by other parties for their own protection, with which the parties to the first action had no concern. We certainly did not say that the Westminster Fire Office was entitled to repudiate their obligation to indemnify the parties to whom their policy was issued, and to allow the loss to fall upon the postponed bondholders after receiving their premiums. I rather think we had in view that in certain eventualities the Westminster Fire Office might be called on to indemnify the parties to whom they were under obligation, and that their obligation under their policy was the limit of the claims which could be preferred against them.

"The postponed bondholders have now brought their action against the Westminster Fire Office, and I am to consider the claim. It is admitted that the subjects have not been, and are not going to be, reinstated. It is also admitted or proved that in their present condition the subjects do not afford to the pursuers the security which was afforded by the margin of value of the completed subjects on which the pursuers lent their money, and against which they insured their interest.

"The sum insured with the Westminster is £900, but the pursuers are not claiming the entire sum, but only £565, being the amount of their insurance on those parts of the subjects which were destroyed by fire. It is proved to my satisfaction that the value of the pursuers' security has, in fact, been diminished to the extent of £565 ; and in these circumstances I conceive that the pursuers are entitled to have their claims against the company constituted by decree.

"My chief difficulty in the case has been to find a stateable argument against the conclusions of the summons ; and although I have received valuable assistance from counsel on both sides, I think they have to some extent laboured under the same difficulty. I understand, however, that it is maintained by the defenders that they ought not to be compelled to pay anything to their assured, because it is said sums equal in amount to the fire damage have been paid by other insurance companies to parties other than the pursuers. It is not said that the pursuers have derived any benefit from such payments, and it is the fact that the indemnity paid to the prior bondholders was applied by them towards the reduction of the debt and interest due to them, and not to the reinstatement of the property. I fail to see how the fact of such payments being made is, or can be, an answer to the present claim.

"Then it is said that it is a universal proposition in the law of insurance that no more can be recovered in the aggregate by the different persons or interests assured than the amount of the fire damage. This is the defenders' proposition,

The defenders reclaimed.

After a hearing the Second Division appointed the case to be sent to the whole Court on minutes of debate.

The following is an epitome of the minutes of debate :—

Argued for the defenders and reclaimers ;—The questions raised by the Lord Ordinary's judgment were these two—(1) Whether any sum was due to the pursuers ; and (2) If any, what sum.

(1) The first question depended upon the affirmance or the reverse of

No. 176.

July 16, 1887.
Glasgow Pro-
vident Investment Society
v. Westminster Fire
Office.

but it is not shewn that it has been received into our law, and I see strong objections to its reception.

"There is a rule of law of a more limited nature, that an assured person can in no case recover more than an indemnity for his individual loss. The rule is founded on obvious considerations of public utility and safety, and is but another expression for the proposition that the assured must have an insurable interest to the extent of the sum which he recovers. But the conclusion drawn from this expression—namely, that the aggregate of all the sums which may be recovered under policies insuring different interests cannot exceed the value of the subjects is, I think, an erroneous generalisation, and one which, if acted on, must lead to very inequitable results.

"The proposition only holds true when the indemnity is given by reinstating, because this is specific performance, and is an indivisible act, the benefit of which accrues to every holder of an interest in the subjects, whether he is insured against fire or not. But where compensation is made in money by the different companies for the benefit of the interests which they have respectively insured there is no indirect benefit to anyone. Each of the assured creditors or owners settles his claim with his underwriter on such terms as may be agreed on, and nothing is more likely than that the sum of all the separate payments under such agreements should exceed the amount of the fire damage. This is in fact a very disadvantageous mode of settlement for the insurance companies, but it is not in my view inequitable or unfair, because it is always to be remembered that each of the companies receives in premiums the full equivalent for risks which they respectively undertake, and the actuarial value of each insurance is in no way altered by the circumstance that other insurances have been effected for different interests. The more economical arrangement for the companies obviously is, that they should reinstate, and this they can always do by agreement amongst themselves, because the election to reinstate lies with the companies. If the insurance companies do not reinstate, each pecuniary claim by a bondholder, or interested party, must, in my opinion, be settled just as if no other person had insured his interest in these subjects. This I conceive to be the principle of the decision in the previous action—Scottish Amicable v. Northern Assurance Company (11 R. 287), and I see no difference in principle between the two cases.

"My view of the present case may be summed up in this proposition : An insurance against fire by a postponed bondholder is virtually an insurance against the risk that in case of a fire occurring prior insurances may not be available for his benefit, or if available pro tanto, may not be sufficient to protect him against loss. I have assumed as a condition of the question, that at the date of the fire the pursuers had an insurable interest in the property to the extent of £900 ; in other words, that the property, if exposed for sale, would have produced a sum sufficient to meet prior incumbrances as well as the £900. Mr Pearson, for the pursuers, stated that he did not propose to lead evidence on the question of the value of the property, because insurable interest was to be presumed. In this contention I think he was well founded. The Dean of Faculty, for the defenders, adduced no evidence in disproof of the assumed value of the property, and for the purposes of the present case I have held that the property was a good security for the sum of £900, and that to the extent of £565 the pursuers have lost the benefit of their security through fire. The sum of £5 having been paid by the defenders, the decree will be for £560."

No. 176.

July 16, 1887.
Glasgow Pro-
vident Investment Society
v. Westminster Fire
Office.

this general proposition, which the defenders submitted to be true, viz., that under a contract of fire insurance of subjects specifically described no more money could in the aggregate, however many policies of insurance there might be, be recovered than a sum representing the total damage done by fire. That was the opinion of Lord Young in the former action,¹ but the Lord Ordinary here had taken the opposite view, expressing the opinion that both the former and the present case depended on the same principle, viz., that if the insurance companies did not reinstate, each pecuniary claim by a bondholder must be settled just as if no other person had insured his interest in the subjects. If the former decision involved that principle then the defenders were, in a case sent to the whole Court, entitled to maintain that it was erroneous. In the opinion of the defenders, however, the former case involved no such principle, and raised a question of procedure merely. The Court could deal with that action only as it was presented to them by the parties, and in that action it was common ground between the parties, and conceded by the counsel representing them—(First) That the pursuers, the bondholders, were in right of preferable bonds to the extent of £9000; and (Second) That if the loss, as finally ascertained, was less in amount than £9000, and than the sums insured under the preferable policies, it fell to be paid to the preferable bondholders, leaving nothing for the deferred bondholders. The object of the defenders in the former action in pleading that all parties were not called was based upon this, that the postponed insurance companies were ready to make contribution to the loss, indeed, considered themselves bound to do so, both at common law and in virtue of the contribution clauses contained in all the policies,—provided that they were assured of being free from any claims at the instance of the postponed bondholders or the owners. In other words, the first plea urged by the defenders in that action, viz., all parties not called, was really put forward with a view to their fourth plea being ultimately sustained, viz., the plea that they were only bound to contribute rateably along with the three postponed companies. The Court decided that upon the case as put before them there was no necessity for calling either the postponed bondholder or the three companies, but that was only upon the admission that the sums contained in the prior bonds were greater in amount than the whole sum claimed in respect of the loss. The present action must now be decided just as if the Court had taken the opposite view and called all parties in the first action, and it was no part of the present defenders' case that the sums recovered in the former action, in respect of the damage done by the fire, were wrongly paid to the prior bondholders. On the contrary, had they been called to the prior action, their contention would have been that those sums ought to be paid. To these sums they would have been willing to make their contribution, while at the same time they would have maintained that beyond that contribution no other sum could be recovered from them, except the £5 embraced in the present pursuers' policy and not in the others (falling, therefore, to be paid to the present pursuers), to which the other companies would have been bound to contribute in their turn. The defenders therefore conceived that they were in no way hampered by the decision in the former action.

The Lord Ordinary admitted that the proposition that the aggregate of the different interests in a subject could not exceed the total value of the subject applied when the indemnity was given by way of reinstatement, but he declined to apply it when the indemnity took the form of a money payment. It was surely a strange result that the rights and liabilities of parties under two modes of giving indemnity, which were always viewed as exactly equivalent, should be so entirely different. The Lord Ordinary further admitted that "there is a rule of law of a more limited nature that an assured person can in no case recover more than indemnity for his individual loss"; but the result of the interlocutor under review was to relieve the Messrs Hay, who were parties to all the policies, of debt to the amount of £6228, 16s. 8d., through the destruction of property worth only £5668, 16s. 8d. Such a result greatly increased the risk which insurance companies undertook by reason of the inducement to over-insurance, and consequently to carelessness, and even wilful fire raising, which it held out. Buildings worth £1000 might be insured in the names of ten creditors on separate bonds each for £1000, and on the total destruction of the premises by fire £10,000 in the aggregate might, on the Lord Ordinary's view, be recovered, the objection of no insurable interest (taking the Lord Ordinary's test of insurable interest "that the property, if exposed to sale, would have produced a sum sufficient to meet the whole encumbrances") being met by supposing the site to be worth £10,000. The Lord Ordinary's view that insurable interest was to be presumed was erroneous; the onus was on the insured of proving insurable interest,¹ if it was denied, and it was denied here by the defenders in their stat. 4. This onus the pursuers had failed to discharge. Apart from the ground, which was not a proper subject for insurance against fire, there would be no reversion after satisfying the prior bonds. As a matter of fact, it appeared that in the case of three items—the mill, the boiler-house, and the store—there was no margin of value to be insured, their values, according to the pursuer's own witnesses, being respectively £1683, 4s., £20, and £16, 9s. 5d., while the corresponding sums insured by the preferable bondholders were £2200, £30, and £20. The defenders believed that there was no margin on the other buildings either.

The general question was not concluded by direct authority either in Scotland or in England, but the opinions of *Arnould*² and *Bunyon*³ were in favour of the defender's view. Apart from authority, the question must be determined by the terms of the policy. It insured against loss from damage by fire the property described on the margin thereof. The property so described consisted of various buildings set forth by description, with the sum insured applicable to each opposite each item. Such terms constituted a separate insurance of each item, and not an insurance of the whole as a unum quid. The general description by name and situation was for identification only, and the case of a set of books put by the pursuers would not be parallel unless a specific sum were insured on each volume.

The first question that arose upon the policy, was whether the bondholders were entitled to treat the contract as one with themselves alone, and to shake themselves free entirely of the interests of the proprietors, in whose names also the insurance was taken, and by whom the premiums were practically paid, being put to their debit in the account between them and the lenders under the bond. On this point the opinion of the majority of the Court in the former case was against the defenders, but they referred to the opinion of Lord Young in that case,⁴ and also to the recent case of

No. 176.
July 16, 1887.
Glasgow Provident Investment Society
v. Westminster Fire Office.

¹ Arnould on Insurance (5th edit.), p. 125; Cousins v. Nantes, May 25, 1811, 3 Taunton, 513; Lucena v. Craufurd, 1806, 2 Bosanquet & Puller (New Reps.) 269.

² Arnould on Marine Insurance, 5th edit. pp. 117 and 118.

³ Bunyon on Fire Insurance, pp. 130, 131, 133.

⁴ 11 R. 296.

No. 176. *Nichols v. The Scottish Union and National Insurance Co.*¹ It was

July 16, 1887.
Glasgow Pro-
vident Investment Society
v. Westminster Fire
Office.

evident that the Hays themselves could not recover twice in respect of the same fire injuring the same subjects, simply because they had effected insurances under more than one policy. The interests of the bondholders, whether prior or postponed, were necessarily derivative from the interests of the Hays; and further, the Hays themselves were associated by the very terms of all the policies. It could make no difference that the contracts by the Hays and their various creditors with the insurance companies were contained in more than one instrument. In other words, the owners' interest in the property, after granting the first bonds, was in the reversion only, and the reversion was the only subject conveyed in security to the postponed bondholders. They could therefore insure only the reversion, when the preferable bondholders had already insured, and what was insured as regarded any particular item by the second set of policies was just the margin of value existing upon that particular item remaining uninsured under the first set of policies. The way in which the items into which the whole sums insured by the postponed policy were apportioned was directed by a consideration of what particular portions of the buildings, &c., were not already insured, or were supposed to be not already insured, up to their full value under the preferable policies, and although an attempt was made at the proof to represent that this was not the case, the proof of it appeared from the cross-examination of Mr. Hay. The contingency, which was possible but which did not in fact occur, that the depreciation by fire should exceed the amount insured by the prior bondholders, was what the postponed bondholders insured, and this contingency taken along with the defenders' offer to contribute, constituted an answer to any argument based upon the supposed inequity of the Insurance Company receiving the premiums in respect of this postponed policy. The pursuers never could have recovered independently, except in the case of items not insured under the preferable policies, unless the loss exceeded the sums insured under the preferable policies. Even then they could hardly be said to recover independently, for they could only have recovered the balance of loss after deduction of the amounts, if any, insured and recovered under the preferable policies, and to this balance they would have been entitled even if all the companies had been allowed to contribute according to their contention in the former action. In the present case, on this view, the insurers would pay all that was contemplated by the contract; the owners, by whom all the premiums were practically paid, would be in no worse and no better position than if they had over-insured the property in their own names with different offices, for they would ultimately recover the full amount of the fire damage through the reduction of their bonds; and the postponed bondholders would not suffer loss, for they had practically paid no premiums, and their security, the reversion, did not suffer by the fire, for it became more valuable to the full amount of the fire damage through the reduction of the preferable bonds. In other words, if the second insurance was effected in the interests of the postponed bondholders apart from the owners, then it was an insurance against a contingency which had not occurred, and nothing was recoverable. If it was practically a further insurance by the owners, then only a contribution was recoverable by the owners, or rather in this case by the other companies, which had already paid the amount of the loss.

¹ Nichols v. Scottish Union and National Insurance Company, Dec. 18, 1885. A report of this case (not reported in any of the regular reports) was printed as an appendix to the defenders' minute of debate, and is reprinted in appendix to the present volume.

As regarded reinstatement, while the defenders were willing to join with the other offices in reinstating, that course was not possible to the defenders by themselves, the sum insured with them being quite inadequate and their policy not covering all subjects requisite to restore the premises as a going concern.

The next question on the construction of the policy was what was it that was insured by the policy? The pursuers' contention amounted to this—that what they insured was the debt, not the buildings. But the insurance of a debt, while of course perfectly legal, was not a contract which was contained in a policy of fire insurance, it was not a contract which the defenders by their constitution could enter into, and it was not in fact the contract which the policy here constituted. It was said that the word “property” occurring in the policy meant “proprietary interest”—that it had been so held in the former action. But the word did not occur there, as it did here, in the body of the policy, with a reference to the margin, where were set forth various constituent parts of a building; it was found only in the contribution clause. Further, in the case of The North British and Mercantile Insurance Company,¹ on which the majority of the Court in the former action founded, the opinions as to the meaning of the word “property” were obiter, and the opinion of Lord Justice Mellish, rightly read, was adverse to the pursuers' construction of the word.² The case of Nichols,³ already referred to, was likewise adverse to that construction, as also was the case of Menzies.⁴

If these two last cases were rightly decided the decision in the former action by the preferable bondholders was wrong, and all the offices insuring ought to have been admitted to contribute, and the insured ranked on the sum contributed according to their preferences and policies.

(2) On the second question raised by the case, viz., upon the supposition that the defenders' general argument was not well founded, what sum were the pursuers entitled to recover, the defenders submitted that even on this supposition the Lord Ordinary's interlocutor must be altered.

With regard to the last item but one of the pursuers' claim as set forth in cond. 4, viz., £5, there was no controversy. With regard to the first item, viz., £190, in respect of the barley mill and counting-house, it was admitted that damage to an extent greater than that sum was done by the fire, and consequently if the defenders were wrong in their general argument, and could not in any way found upon the payments already made by the other offices, they had no defence upon this item. The same result followed as regarded the next item of £120 for the rent of the mill, but under this qualification, that as the policy contained an apportionment of rent clause (supra, p. 949), and as the oversman had fixed eight months as the period which might fairly be taken to be the time necessary for restoring the mill, against which there was no contrary evidence, this sum of £120 fell to be reduced to £80. The next item was that of the steam-boiler house, in respect of which the pursuers claimed £80, and £10 for the rent, being the full sums insured. But the steam-boiler house was not injured by the fire at all. The pursuers admitted that the amount found due by the oversman, and paid in the former action, was sufficient for the reinstatement of the subjects destroyed by fire. But the oversman

No. 176.

July 16, 1887.
Glasgow Provident Investment Society v. Westminster Fire Office.

¹ North British and Mercantile Insurance Co. v. London, Liverpool, and Globe Insurance Co., April 13, 1877, L. R., 5 Chanc. Div. 569.

² 5 Chanc. Div. pp. 583-4.

³ Nichols v. Scottish Union and National Insurance Company, Dec. 18, 1885, supra, p. 956, note.

⁴ Menzies v. North British and Mercantile Insurance Co., Feb. 13, 1847, 9 D. 694, 19 Scot. Jur. 291.

No. 176.

July 16, 1887.
Glasgow Provident Investment Society
v. Westminster Fire Office.

allowed nothing in respect of the building of the steam-boiler house, and he could not have allowed anything for the rent if he had been called on to decide in regard to it (which he was not, as it was not insured under the preferable policies), for the building was evidently not untenable in consequence of fire in terms of the rent clause above quoted. In the same way the item steam-boiler and connections, for which the pursuers claimed the sum insured, £80, was according to the oversman injured only to the extent of £15; and the engine, for which they claimed £50, was injured only to the extent of £20; while the store, for which they claimed £30, was injured to the extent of £9, 10s. The pursuers did not attempt to contradict these statements, but they sought to prove their case upon this point by estimating the difference of value between the various items as parts of a going concern, and their break-up value for removal as old material, and the difference in value being more than the sum insured, they contended that they were entitled to recover the whole sum. This method of proof, and the reasoning on which it proceeded, was entirely fallacious. It allowed the pursuers to recover in respect of each item, not the loss which had occurred by reason of fire damage to that item, but the loss which had occurred through the effect of fire damage to other items, and subjects of great value, as, for example, the engine and boiler were treated as total losses, although they were, at most, very slightly injured. The effect of this was, first, entirely to destroy the effect of the specification of the items contained in the contract, and to turn the insurance into a catholic instead of a specified insurance. In the second place, it entirely reversed the principles upon which the loss had been made good, and, it was here assumed, rightly made good in the prior case, and allowed the postponed bondholders' loss to be assessed in a different way from that of the preferable bondholders and owners, with the effect of enabling them to recover on the same items greater sums than the preferable bondholders and the owners could. In other words, the prior bondholder was paid in respect of the damage done to what the fire had consumed. The postponed bondholder was paid in respect of the consequential damage done to what the fire had not consumed, but had left untouched. If the element of a going concern was to be taken into view, then in the case of a manufactory containing two buildings, A and B, the operations of which were dependent each upon the other, A being insured, but B uninsured, it would be possible to recover in respect of A the damage suffered in consequence of a fire which consumed B. If the mill here had not been burned, the boiler and engine would have been useful as parts of a going concern; yet it was presumed that even upon the pursuers' own contention they could not go beyond the terms of their own policy to ask for reinstatement of the machinery, which, though insured in the former policies, was not insured in the pursuers' policy. But the boiler and engine would be just as useless without machinery to drive as they would be without a mill in which that machinery could be placed. In any view, therefore, the pursuers could not recover more than the sums allowed by the oversman in the last action, which they had admitted to be sufficient for the reinstatement of the property.

Argued for the pursuers and respondents;—The result of the judgment in the former case arising out of this fire was to establish the principle for which the pursuers here contended, viz., as the Lord Ordinary in the present case put it, that "if the insurance companies do not reinstate, each pecuniary claim by a bondholder or interested party must be settled just as if no other person had insured his interests in these subjects." The defenders disputed that, maintaining that the only question in the former action was one of procedure, but that the present action was the necessary corollary of the former one was apparent from the opinion of Lord Young,¹ as well as of the Judges constituting the majority. No. 176.

The pursuers here sought indemnity, as it was undertaken by their contract with the defenders to be given, either by reinstatement or by payment of the loss. On the latter alternative they claimed £565 as the measure of the extent to which their security over the property described in and assured by their policy had been impaired by the fire. That the pursuers, as creditors of the owners of the mills, and holding securities over them, were entitled to insure was not disputed, and had statutory warrant for it.* Nor was it disputed, on record at least, that the pursuers had an insurable interest both at the date of the policy and at the date of the fire, although the defenders now seemed to suggest that they intended to raise the question whether the pursuers at the date of the fire had an insurable interest, maintaining that the pursuers could not prove that the insured subjects, apart from the ground, would have any reversion after satisfying the preferable bonds. The only defence stated on the record was that as £5668, 16s. 8d. would suffice to reinstate the damaged premises, and as that sum had been paid to creditors with rights not only preferable to the pursuers', but also greater in extent than the amount necessary to reinstate the premises, there remained nothing for the pursuers to get. That defence virtually amounted to a denial that the pursuers had suffered any loss by the fire. The fire, it was suggested, had not extended its ravages beyond the limits of the property dedicated to meet the prior bondholders' claim, and had never, therefore, touched the margin of value on which the pursuers relied for payment of their debt; and thus, as the defenders contended, the Hays' interest being limited, after the prior bonds had been granted, to the reversion merely, that reversion was, in reality, the only subject conveyed in security to the postponed bondholders. What, therefore, was insured by them, in the case of any particular item, was simply the margin of value uncovered by prior insurance. Even assuming that to be sound, the defence based on it laboured under the fallacy of assuming that what was insured was not a unum quid—a mill and its machinery—but a mass of fungibles, from which, if a certain portion be taken away, the value of what remained was unimpaired. £5668 expended on the mills might suffice to restore them to the condition in which they had been prior to the fire. But that sum not so expended could not be said to afford a measure of the difference between the value of the mills before the fire and the ruins which the fire had left. Let it be assumed that the property insured consisted of a book in several volumes. If one volume was destroyed, the whole set was spoiled. A few shillings might be the value of one volume, but if that volume could not be replaced it could not be maintained that the difference in value between the complete and the incomplete set was measured by the value of the one volume. In the present case the evidence amply shewed that the materials left by the fire were of a very different value according as restoration was proposed or not—(See for some of the details on this point the last paragraph of the pursuers' argument). If the defence put forward were sound, a company with which a postponed bondholder had insured could be called upon to pay only when a fire had occurred so extensive that to restore the property against its effects would require a larger sum than the amount of

July 16, 1887.
Glasgow Provident Investment Society v. Westminster Fire Office.

¹ 11 R. 298.

* Titles to Land Consolidation Act, 1868 (31 and 32 Vict. cap. 101), sec. 6, 119, 122.

No. 176.

July 16, 1887.
Glasgow Pro-
vident Investment Society
v. Westminster Fire
Office.

the prior bondholder's debt, and even then only the amount by which the expense of reinstatement exceeded that bondholder's debt. Further, in the case supposed, it would obviously not be in the interest of either the prior or the postponed bondholder's insurer to exercise the option of reinstatement. It was said, however, that if the pursuers' claim in the present action were sustained, they would fare much better than the prior bondholders. That might be so; but it was not inequitable. It was entirely a matter of choice for the prior bondholder, who had received from his own insurers a sum of money, which was confessedly sufficient to put him in as favourable a position as he was the day before the fire.

The defenders perilled their case mainly upon the broad argument that in no case, and under no conditions, could the insurance money, recoverable in consequence of a fire, exceed the amount requisite to reinstate the damaged property. No authority was cited in support of the proposition, either from Scots or from English law, and the pursuers disputed its soundness except where the money recovered was expended in reinstatement; in that event the second bondholder's claim fell, for there was then no loss. The case in Arnould, cited by the defenders, and the case of Nichols,¹ were not in point, for in both the interests insured, that of the owner and the mortgagee, were held in the particular cases to be identical, and the contribution clause in consequence was held to apply, but in the former action arising out of this fire, where the contract was precisely similar to the present, that identity of interest between the owner and the prior bondholder was held not to exist, and the existence of a difference of interest between the prior and the postponed bondholders was obvious. The postponed bondholder's insurance was, as the Lord Ordinary put it, "virtually an insurance against the risk that, in the case of a fire occurring, prior insurances may not be available for his benefit, or, if available pro tanto, may not be sufficient to protect him against loss." That was the eventuality against which the defenders in return for the premiums undertook to protect the pursuers, and it was that protection which they refused to give.

The proposition that the amount necessary to reinstate was, in all circumstances, the measure of the loss, violated the most elementary principles of the law of contract, and would, if received, work out most inequitable results. To take the case of a house worth £2000 bonded for £1500, there being three creditors, each with a bond for £500, ranking not pari passu, but according to the dates of infestment; each creditor insured the property for £500, and a fire occurred which did damage which it would cost £750 to remedy: The first bondholder claimed under his policy the full sum insured—£500; the second did the same, and so also the third. The result was that £1500 of insurance money was recovered in respect of a fire, the effects of which could be remedied by an expenditure of £750. But if the defenders' contention be sound, then the first bondholder would recover £500, the second only £250, and the third nothing, the amount necessary to reinstate having been paid to others holding rights preferable to his. And so a payment by a company, with which the pursuers had no contract, to a person with whom they had equally no contract, and from which they derived no benefit, would enable the pursuers to evade their obligations, however long they might have pocketed the premiums. A result so contrary to justice could only be avoided by holding, as the Court did in the former case, that each bondholder's policy was a separate contract of indemnity, to be fulfilled by each insurer when loss to his insured had been established, and not to be affected in any way by other insurances effected to protect other interests. Any apparent unfairness to the insuring companies on the ground that they should be compelled to pay among them more than would remedy the disaster insured against was answered by the consideration that they need not so pay unless they chose; they might reinstate if they saw fit.

¹ Nichols v. Scottish Union and National Insurance Company, supra, p. 956. note.

No. 176.
July 16, 1887.
Glasgow Provident Investment Society
v. Westminster Fire Office.

The only question which remained was as to the amount of the loss. The claim was for £565; the sum in the policy was £900. The defenders did not dispute the claim for damage done to the mill and counting-house, and the loss of one year's rent, in all £310. They disputed the claim of £80 for damage done to the boiler-house. This, it was true, was untouched by the fire, for its injury was due to operations undertaken for the extinction of the fire. But that was incidental damage within the policy, though to repair the damage would only take £2.¹ And if it were not repaired along with the other property insured in the policy (and there was no offer by the defenders to reinstate), it would be totally useless, and that through the occurrence of risks within the policy. If so, the pursuers would be entitled to £80, being the amount set against it on the margin of the policy, with one year's rent, £10. The next item was the steam-boiler and connections, for which the sum set against it, £80, was claimed. The defenders said that £15 would remedy all the fire damage to it. Even if that were so, there was no proposal for reinstatement, and the boiler, as it stood, was not worth more than £100, instead of £350 before the fire. In like manner, it was said that £20 would suffice to restore the steam-engine and appurtenances, for which £50 was claimed, against the effects of the fire. But here, again, there was no proposal to reinstate, and the engine, before the fire worth £800, was now worth only £100. Similarly with regard to the £30 for damage to the smith's shop and furnishing store, it was said that an expenditure of £9, 10s. would suffice to remedy the fire damage. But prior to the fire they had been worth £30, now they were absolutely useless. The sums awarded, therefore, were trifling in comparison with the diminution in the value of the security subjects consequent on the fire, and it was this diminution in value which the defenders, by their contract, undertook to make up to the pursuers, either by paying the money value of the diminution, or by reinstating; and they refused to do either.

After the minutes of debate had been boxed the parties put in a minute of admissions, in which they admitted—“(1) That immediately before the date of the fire mentioned on record, viz., 1st August 1882, the value of the site, buildings, and machinery of the Greenhead Grain Mills was sufficient to cover not only the prior bonds but also the pursuers' bond. (2) That the value of the site of the said mills, and the salvage thereon of buildings and machinery after the fire, did not exceed, according to the pursuers' valuers, £3500; and according to the defenders' valuers, £6900; and was not sufficient to meet the bonds prior to that of the pursuers, the prior bonds amounting to over £8600. (3) That the insurable subjects, viz., the buildings and machinery, apart from the site, were never sufficient in value to meet the bonds prior to the pursuers'. (4) That of the items insured by the pursuers, and in respect of which they claim—(a) Building of mill, item 1, building of boiler-house, item 14, and building of store adjoining boiler, item 17, of tabulated statement, joint appendix A, page 30,* were fully insured by the prior

¹ Bell's Prins. sec. 511; Johnston v. West of Scotland Insurance Co., Nov. 25, 1828, 7 Sh. 53.

* See supra, p. 951, note.

No. 176. bondholders; and if the full sums insured by the said prior bondholders had been recovered, they would have been sufficient to reinstate said subjects in the event of a total loss. (b) Steam-engine and foundations item 9, and steam-boiler and connections, item 16, of said statement, were not fully insured by said prior bondholders; and (c) rent of steam-boiler house, item 15, and rent of store, item 18, of said statement, were not insured at all by the prior bondholders. (d) For values of rents, reference is made to the evidence."

July 16, 1887.
Glasgow Provident Investment Society v. Westminster Fire Office.

Thereafter a hearing in presence before the whole Court was appointed. The parties were then heard on the whole case,¹ but on an intimation from the Bench the arguments were mainly directed to the question whether the foregoing minute of admissions involved the admission that the pursuers had had no insurable interest.

The following opinions were returned by the consulted Judges:—

LORD PRESIDENT, LORD SHAND, LORD ADAM, LORD LEE, and LORD KINSMAN.—We are of opinion that the interlocutor of the Lord Ordinary is right, in so far as it finds that the pursuers, who are postponed bondholders over the subjects injured by fire, have sustained damage by the fire and have not been indemnified; and therefore that they are entitled to recover an indemnity from the defenders. The owners of the subjects, who concur in the action, have been fully indemnified already, and are, in our judgment, entitled to no further indemnity. But the question considered by the Lord Ordinary, and the only question upon which we understand the opinion of the consulted Judges to be required, is whether the present claim at the instance of the postponed bondholders can be sustained, notwithstanding that the loss has been made good to the prior bondholders, and to the owners.

It does not appear to us to create any serious difficulty, that the owners and creditors are insured by the same policy. For by the terms of the obligation, the right of the insured is not joint, but joint and several. A security over buildings cannot be regarded as giving an effectual real right, if the bondholder's interest be not directly secured by insurance recoverable by himself, for a fire destructive of the premises would leave the lender the personal security of his debtor only. The policy in question was accordingly taken out by the bondholders themselves. Mr R. H. Hay says,—“The manager of the Provident Society effected the policy and arranged for it.” The policy so effected was taken in name of the Society to secure their interest as bondholders,—with the addition that it was taken in name of the owners “in reversion.” This necessarily gives the bondholders the right and title, on the occurrence of a fire, to recover for loss in respect of the injury to their security or interest as bondholders. They have, therefore, a separate right, upon which they are entitled to sue, independently of the owners; and their legal position in an action upon the policy to recover to the extent of their own loss, appears to us to be precisely the same as if they had insured for their own interest alone, without mention of the reversionary interest of the owners. The questions for consideration in the one case, as in the other, must be whether they have suffered loss by fire, and whether they have been indemnified.

It cannot be disputed that the postponed bondholders had an insurable interest, or that they have suffered loss by the damage done by fire to the subject of their security. They had an insurable interest as creditors infest in security; and the value of their security has been diminished by the fire. The only question therefore is, whether they have been in fact, or whether they must be held in law, to have been indemnified. It is admitted, on the one hand, that sums equal to the amount of the fire damage have been paid by other companies to preferable bondholders; and on the other, that these sums have not been so applied as to put the postponed bondholders in the same position as if the fire had not taken place. For it is admitted that before the fire the subjects of security were sufficient to cover the pursuers' bond as well as the prior bonds; and that after the fire, the value of the site with the salvage of the insurable subjects was not sufficient to meet even the prior bonds. The admission in article 1st of the joint minute, that "the value of the site, buildings, and machinery of the Greenhead Grain Mills was sufficient to cover not only the prior bonds, but also the pursuers' bonds," excludes any argument to the effect that the bondholders had no insurable interest. The subject of the insurance was the property—the particular buildings and machinery specified in the policy were all parts of the property—the machinery having been built into or permanently attached to the ground, and the value of the security depended on the unity of the subject—site, buildings, and machinery. The insurance was one over a composite subject, the sum insured being allocated over the particular buildings and machinery enumerated in the policy, and the injury to these by the fire, inasmuch as it not only destroyed the particular buildings and machinery, but greatly depreciated the composite subject, destroyed also the security for the protection of which the insurance was effected. The pursuers, the bondholders, have had no indemnity. It is true that the indemnity paid to the prior bondholders was applied towards the reduction of their debt: and this might have resulted in a practical indemnity to the postponed creditors also, if it could have been shewn that the reduction of the prior debt was in fact an equivalent for the damage by fire. But it is admitted that the damaged subjects do not in fact afford as good a security for the diminished debt, as the entire subjects afforded for the whole debt before the fire. Whether the insured have been indemnified is not a question of law or of legal inference, but a question of fact; and we take it to be conclusively established, by the admissions of parties, that the postponed bondholders have not in fact been indemnified.

¹ Additional Authorities.—Castellain v. Preston, March 12, 1883, L. R. 11 Q. B. D. 380; Godin v. London Assurance Co., 1758, 1 Bur. 490; Marshall on Marine Insurance, 5th edit. pp. 105-6; Philipps on Insurance, 4th edit. vol. i. p. 206.

The question therefore comes to be, whether the payment of an indemnity by other insurers to other bondholders affords an answer to the action of the postponed bondholders who have not been indemnified, upon their separate policy. If the question be considered, as we think it ought to be, between these bondholders, as suing for their own interest, and their insurers, we are unable to see any reason why they should not be entitled to recover. They have made an insurance in their own name and for their own benefit; and it is no answer to a claim upon their independent contract, that other persons have insured other interests by contracts upon which they have no title to found. The only ground upon which the insurer can plead that other contracts must be taken into account, is that there has been, in substance if not in form, a double insurance. But it cannot be said that there is a double insurance, if the same persons are not to have the benefit of both policies. The principle is very clearly stated by Lord Mansfield in the case of Godin v. The London Assurance

No. 176.

July 16, 1887.
The Glasgow Provident Investment Society v. Westminster Fire Office.

No. 176. Company, 1 Bur. 490,—“Two persons may insure two different interests, each for the whole value, as the master for cargo, the owner for freight, &c. But a double insurance is where the same man is to receive two sums instead of one or the same sum twice over for the same loss, by reason of his having made two insurances upon the same goods or the same ship.”

July 16, 1887.
Glasgow Pro-
vident Investment Society
v. Westminster Fire
Office.

It is true that the pursuers might have derived an advantage from the execution of contracts to which they were not parties, if the insurers had exercised their option of reinstating. But that would have been an incidental advantage arising from their interest in the property, and not from their interest in the policy. As the Lord Ordinary points out, it is an advantage which they would have equally obtained whether they had been insured or not; and the possibility that the insured might have benefited in an event which has not happened, by the performance of a contract to which he was not a party, can afford no answer to the insurer in defence to an action upon a policy. In another passage of his judgment Lord Mansfield points out that if the insured “is to have the benefit of both policies in all events it can never be considered as a double insurance.” And it is just because a postponed creditor will take no benefit from the insurances of prior creditors, except in an event which may or may not happen, and which he has no power to bring about, that he takes the precaution of insuring separately for himself.

For the same reason, we think it clear that the defenders have no answer upon the 9th clause of the conditions of their policy, where it is stipulated, that “if at the time of any loss or damage by fire happening to any property hereby insured, there be any other subsisting insurance or insurances whether effected by the insured or by any other person on his behalf, covering the same property,” the Society shall be liable only for a rateable proportion. If the owners alone were suing for their own interest, this contributory clause would come into effect. But the other policies were not effected by the postponed bondholders, or by any person on their behalf. The difficulty which arose in the case of the North British Insurance Co., 5 Chan. Div. 569, from the wording of the policies, does not arise.

But it is said that to allow either pursuer to recover would be contrary to a well-established doctrine in insurance law, viz., that all the insured persons or interests can never recover more in the aggregate from all the insurers than the amount of the damage by fire. We know of no authority for this proposition; and we agree with the Lord Ordinary in thinking it unsound. It may be that in the practical explication of the various rights and liabilities of insurers and insured, the whole number of insurers will not in general be required to pay more, among them, than the amount of the damage. For it is certain, on the one hand, that none of the insured can recover more than full indemnity; and on the other, that the sum of the values of the separate interests in the subject insured cannot exceed the entire value of the subject. But there nevertheless may be cases where different persons having different interests may each insure for the full value of the property; and where, if the property is destroyed by fire, each may recover upon his own policy to the full extent of his insurance. If a house, for example, is burdened with debt to the full extent of its value, the owner and the heritable creditor may each insure in his own name and for his own benefit for the full value of the house; and we know of no rule of law which will prevent either from recovering under his own policy in the event of a total loss. No doubt the insurers of the creditor's interest, if they are called upon to pay, will be entitled, as an incident of the contract of indemnity, to be assigned into his rights as against the debtor; and if the latter be solvent, they may recover from him the sums which they have paid as indemnity to his creditors. This is the case explained by Lord Justice Mellish in the North British Insurance Company v. the London and Globe Insurance Company (L. R. 5 Chan. Div. 583), in a passage of his opinion which appears to have been misunderstood. The Lord Justice points out, that "where different persons insure the same property in respect of their different rights, they may be divided into two classes. It may be that the interest of the two between them makes up the whole property, as in the case of a tenant for life and remainder-man"; and in that case, "they would recover from their respective insurance companies the value of their own interests, and those values added together would make up the value of the property." But, he adds, "there may be cases where, although two different persons are insured in respect of two different rights, each of them would recover the whole, as in the case of mortgager and mortgagee." And he goes on to explain that "wherever that is the case, it will necessarily follow that one of these two has a remedy over against the other," either in respect of a debt secured over the subject, or upon some collateral contract. In such a case the company which has insured the creditor will be entitled to succeed to his remedy against the debtor. But each of the insured persons will have right to recover the full value of the property from the office with which he has insured, although one of them may be obliged in the result to recoup the office which has insured the other, or to make over for that purpose his claim against his own office. If the remedy which falls to be assigned is made good to the assignee, there will be no practical violation of the rule alleged by the reclaimers. But it may turn out to be of no value, from the insolvency of the debtor; and in that case, we think it clear that the supposed rule will afford no answer to the creditor's claim upon the policy which he has effected for his own benefit. It may happen that the insolvent owner of a house which has been destroyed by fire may have recovered the full amount of its value from his own insurers. But that will afford no defence to an action by a heritable creditor, upon a separate contract of insurance with a different office. It is just because a debtor may become insolvent that a creditor has an interest to insure the subject of his security. And yet the result of the action may be that the sums paid by the two insurance companies together will exceed the amount of the damage. But the solvency or insolvency of the debtors of the insured can make no difference to his right to recover upon the contract of insurance. Nor does it appear to us to be of any consequence to the claim of a heritable creditor upon a policy in his own name, to inquire whether the owner has been insured and indemnified, or whether he has not been insured at all. The only importance of the illustration we have suggested is that it tests the operation of the doctrine to which we are asked to give effect; and we think the doctrine unsound, because in the only cases in which it would be of any practical value, it would operate to withhold an indemnity from the insured.

The true principle is, that fire insurance is a contract of indemnity. We assent to what is said by the learned Judges in the Court of Appeal in the case of Castellain v. Preston (L. R. 11 Q. B. 386), that this is "the very foundation of every rule which has been promulgated and acted on by the Courts with regard to insurance law"; and we entirely assent also to what Lord Justice Brett adds as to the necessary consequence of the fundamental principle—viz., that "this contract means that the assured, in case of a loss against which the

No. 176.
July 16, 1887.
Glasgow Provident Investment Society v. Westminster Fire Office.

No. 176.
July 16, 1887.
Glasgow Pro-
vident Investment Society
v. Westminster Fire
Office.

policy has been made, shall be fully indemnified, and shall never be more than fully indemnified. That is the fundamental principle of insurance, and if ever a proposition is brought forward which is at variance with it—that is to say, which either will prevent the assured from obtaining a full indemnity, or which will give the assured more than a full indemnity—that proposition must certainly be wrong.” But this does not mean that the aggregate of the sums paid to different policy-holders upon a number of policies can never exceed the damage. It means that the assured, upon every separate contract of insurance, must be entitled to indemnity, and to nothing more than indemnity; and it follows that the question whether other insurances over the same subject are to be taken into account is not to be solved by any absolute rule at variance with the principle laid down, but must depend upon the benefit which the assured may be entitled to take, or may have in fact derived from those other insurances.

The application of this principle to the present case appears to us to be clear if we are right in thinking that the heritable creditors who sue this action have not been indemnified by the payments already made to the prior creditors for the damage done by fire to the subject of their security. By the damage so done, they have suffered the loss against which they have insured; and they must therefore be entitled to recover to the extent of the loss, because that will give them indemnity under their contract, and nothing more than indemnity. It is no answer that they may recover their debt from the owners, and in that event will suffer no loss: because we take it to be well-settled law that the right of the insured creditor to recover under his policy depends upon his interest at the time of the loss by fire, and not upon his chance of being ultimately satisfied by the operation of collateral contracts with third persons. If the debt had been already paid, that would of course have been a good defence, for the creditors would have had no interest at the time of the fire. But they still stand infeft in the damaged subjects, in security of a debt which they may or may not be able to recover; and that is precisely the loss against which they may have insured. The insurers may be entitled to an assignation of the debt for their relief, if that can be given without prejudice to the insured. But in the meantime, they are bound to pay in terms of their contract. The case of Godin, 1 Bur. 490, appears to us to be a distinct authority to this effect, and the same principle is recognised in the two later cases already cited.

But it is said that if the defenders are called upon to pay, the benefit will ultimately accrue to the indebted owner, who will thus receive more than full indemnity. If that were so, it would, in our judgment, afford no answer to the creditor's claim upon his separate right, unless it could be shewn that he also would be more than indemnified. But the true answer appears to us to be that since the insured is entitled to no more than indemnity, he must assign any remedy which would have enabled him to make good the loss by action against his debtor. The principle is laid down by Lord Cairns in Simson v. Thomson (3 L. R., App. Cases, 279):—“On payment the insurers are entitled to enforce all the remedies, whether in contract or in tort, which the insured has against third parties, whereby the insured can compel such third parties to make good the loss insured against.” But then it is only in so far as his retention of these remedies for his own benefit would operate to give him more than full indemnity, that the insured can be compelled to assign them; and where the amount insured is not equal to the debt, he will be entitled to enforce all his rights to the effect of recovering full payment, and cannot be required to assign to his own prejudice." We express no opinion, therefore, as to whether the third plea in law for the defenders can be sustained, because we have had no argument, either in the written or oral pleadings, as to the defender's claim for an assignation, or as to the conditions upon which the bondholders may be required to assign. But we are of opinion, in the first place, that the defenders are under obligation to pay to the creditors the amount insured by their policy; and, secondly, that the creditors, having received such payment, will not be entitled either to recover the whole debt for their own benefit, or to give their debtors the benefit of their insurance by discharging any part of it, but must, in whatever form, give the insurers the benefit for their relief, of such portion of their claim against the debtors as may have been satisfied by payment of the indemnity.

We have considered the case as if the policy had been taken out in name of the creditors alone, because by the terms of their contract they have a separate and independent right; and a defence which may be good against the owners will therefore be of no avail against them, unless it could have been maintained as effectually if the owners had had no interest in the policy. But the fact that the owners are joined in the policy may have a very important bearing on the questions that may arise as to the defenders' claim to an assignation. It is clear that as the owners also are insured, the insurers could acquire no right to enforce the debt against them, unless they had been already indemnified. And since it is to prevent their being more than fully indemnified that the defenders will recover, if they do in the result recover, a part of the debt due to the other pursuers, questions of contribution may be raised as between them and the other offices. But the possibility of such questions arising cannot affect the right of the insured creditors to recover upon their policy, as soon as the loss occurs. They are not bound to wait for the settlement of questions of contribution that may arise upon contracts to which they are no parties.

While we concur with the Lord Ordinary in his opinion as to the right of the creditors, we think it follows from what we have said that the interlocutor should be so qualified as to make it clear that the other pursuers, Messrs Hay & Brothers, are not to have the benefit of a declarator that they are still entitled to indemnity from the defenders. Their concurrence in the action may probably import nothing more than their assent to the payment of the insurance money to their creditors. But it is possible that a decree in terms of the declaratory conclusion might be construed to mean that they were to be indemnified by the payment pro tanto of their debt; and we think the interlocutor should be so expressed as to exclude this inference. It is an inference which would be exactly in accordance with the rights of parties, if the owners had not been indemnified already. But in the admitted circumstances of the case, it appears to be essential to distinguish between the rights of the insured who have been indemnified under other policies over the same subjects, and those of the insured who had no interest in these policies, and have received no indemnity.

We do not understand that our opinion is desired upon any question as to the amount payable under the policy, assuming the right of the pursuers to recover.

LORD MURE.—In the circumstances of this case, as the facts are now ascertained, I am of opinion that decree of absolvitor should be pronounced in favour of the defenders.

When the fire in question occurred, the Messrs Hay, the proprietors of the

No. 176.
July 16, 1887.
Glasgow Pro-
vident Investment Society
v. Westminster Fire
Office.

No. 176.

July 16, 1887.
Glasgow Pro-
vident Investment Society
v. Westminster Fire
Office.

mills which were burned, had borrowed large sums of money upon the security of their property, and had granted bonds for the amount ; and, in conjunction with the various creditors in those bonds, they had from time to time effected policies of insurance over the property with seven different insurance companies for the aggregate sum of about £9200. These policies were all taken in substantially the same terms, in favour of the respective creditors in the bonds, and of the proprietors, Messrs Hay, in reversion ; and were, as I understand, effected under the obligation usually imposed upon proprietors in such cases, to insure their property at their own expense, and pay the premiums as they became due. The premiums in the policy here in question were paid by the Messrs Hay, as explained by one of themselves in his evidence in this case ; and he also states that he furnished the information of the particulars on which the policy sued on was effected, as specified on the margin of the policy.

Shortly after the fire, certain creditors, who were the holders of the first four of these policies, and whose securities were preferable to that of the present pursuers, brought the action to which we have been referred (11 R. p. 287) against the insurance companies with whom their policies had been effected, for payment of the sums due in respect of the damage done by the fire. That action was raised with the consent of Messrs Hay, who are also pursuers in the present case ; and after a variety of procedure, and an arbitration entered into to ascertain the amount of the loss and damage occasioned by the fire, the total loss so occasioned was found to amount to £5668, 16s. 8d., for which decree was pronounced in favour of the pursuers of that action, which was brought with concurrence of the Messrs Hay.

That this sum was the full amount of the damage done by the fire, and recoverable under the policies then sued on, is very clearly proved by Mr M'Kinnell, who acted as overman in the arbitration, and was examined in this case on the part of the pursuers, who says,—“ I was oversman in the reference between the Scottish Amicable, the first bondholders, and the first insurance companies : I awarded the sum which I found the companies liable to pay as the sum that would be required to restore the place . . . I think the allowances I awarded for buildings, machinery, and rent were the full value of the loss. It was upon that footing that I awarded them . . . (Q.) Even if the insurances had been higher, would you have given more for the machinery, or have you given its full value ? I gave its full value. The sums I gave were sufficient to reinstate the mills as a first-class job.”

The sum, therefore, which was so awarded under the first action was the amount of the whole loss occasioned by the fire, and the full measure of the indemnity recoverable from the insurance companies in respect of that fire ; and it went to relieve the Messrs Hay to the extent of £5668 of the debt which they owed to the creditors with whom they were conjoined as pursuers of that action. That there was no further sum, in the shape of loss caused by the fire, available for distribution either among those preferable creditors, or among the holders of any of the other policies, is, I think, clear from the evidence I have quoted, when taken in connection with article third of the admissions, recently adjusted, which bears (3d) “ That the insurable subjects—viz, the buildings and machinery, apart from the site, were never sufficient in value to meet the bonds prior to the pursuers.” That the site or area is not an insurable subject is distinctly laid down by Mr Bell in his Commentaries (vol. i. p. 628), where he says,—“ The loss is estimated on the destructible parts ; or the whole value of the house, as it would have sold in the market, is taken, deducting the value of the area." No. 176.

Such being the result of the arbitration, and of the admission of parties as to the value of the insurable subjects, it seems to me to be pretty clear, that when the policy now sued on was effected in October 1881, the present pursuers were mistaken in supposing that there remained any margin of insurable property belonging to the Hays, over which a good additional insurance could be effected, after satisfying the claims that might be made under the policies which were then held by the preferable creditors of the Hays, and which covered the whole insurable subjects. Upon the evidence there was no such margin. So that if the pursuers were to obtain decree for the sum now claimed, they would be paid £560 more than the full value of the insurable subjects destroyed, over part of which their policy is said to have been effected, and the Messrs Hay would in this way be relieved of debt to the extent of £560 more than the fair value of the property they were entitled to insure in October 1881, and so to obtain from the defenders £560 more than the value of what was lost by the fire.

Now if such a claim as this had been made by the Messrs Hay, the owners of the mills, upon policies effected by them as proprietors on their own account, it must, as I conceive, have as a matter of course been rejected. It is trite to say, as I have always understood, that no man is entitled to recover, under a fire insurance policy, more than the value of the subjects insured which are destroyed by the fire. This is distinctly stated in most, if not in all, text writers on the subject; and it is very clearly laid down by the late Lord Moncreiff in various parts of his charge to the jury in the case of the Hercules Insurance Company, July 1836 (14 Sh. p. 1137), and more particularly where he says (p. 1142), "The rule is that you can get nothing but indemnification for the thing lost, and that you can get nothing more than the value of the thing lost."

It is accordingly, as I understand the case, not disputed in argument for the pursuers, that if the Messrs Hay had themselves effected all these policies, or had effected one policy for the gross amount, and endeavoured to recover more than the amount of the actual loss occasioned by the fire, they would not have been entitled to succeed. But it is said that this is not the position of matters to be here dealt with; that it is the investment company who are the real pursuers, and that the Messrs Hay are nothing more than mere concurreurs for their interest. I am unable to accede to this view. It appears to me, on the contrary, that the Messrs Hay are substantially the effectors of the policy sued on, and the parties most materially interested in the result of this action. They are the proprietors of the subjects, and although they have had to borrow largely upon the property, the reversionary or radical right is still in them, and they had the material interest to insure it. Under the arrangement between them and the investment company, moreover, they were bound to insure the property, and to keep it insured.

The usual course in such cases, I believe, is for the proprietor to insure, assigning the policy to his creditor, in order to enable him to take such steps as may be necessary for keeping up the policy, and securing the sum due under it, if he has any reason to think the proprietor may fail in his duty in that respect. Instead of doing this, however, in the present case, the policy has by arrangement been here taken in the joint names of the parties. But it was still essentially

July 16, 1887.
Glasgow Provident Investment Society v. Westminster Fire Office.

No. 176.

July 16, 1887.
Glasgow Pro-
vident Investment Society
v. Westminster Fire
Office.

the Messrs Hay's insurance, and, as explained in the evidence, the whole premiums have been paid by them. By means of the first four of the policies, their debts to the extent of £5668 have been paid; and should a further recovery be made under the present action, the sum recovered will go to relieve them still further of their debts. The policy is therefore essentially their policy, and I cannot look upon the other pursuers in any more favourable light, or in any different position than that of the holders of an assignation to a policy effected in name of the proprietors of the property insured. In that case the assignees would, as I apprehend, be in law in the precise same position as their cedents, as regards their right to enforce payment of the sum claimed under the present action, which appears to me to amount substantially to a claim for a double or excessive insurance of a considerable amount. To allow the Investment Society in such circumstances to recover the sum sued for, would in effect be to allow the Hays to obtain payment under the name of the Society of a claim which, under their own name, and as in their own right, they would not have been entitled to enforce.

But, even assuming that the Investment Society had here some kind of interest to insure separate from that of the Messrs Hay, I am of opinion that they are not entitled to recover the sum claimed in this action, because I concur in the opinion expressed by Lord Young in the case of the Scottish Equitable Company, to the effect that, where various parties or interests are insured over the same subjects, the insurances taken together must not exceed the fair insurable value of those subjects, and that if insurances in excess of value are effected, no more can be recovered in respect of those policies, in the event of fire, than the value of the loss caused by the fire.

It is said that there is no authority for this proposition; and there is, I believe, no decided case to that effect. Neither is there any direct decision to the contrary; and having regard to the fact that the rule is express, that where a variety of policies are effected in one name over the same subjects in excess of the insurable value, no more than the actual loss, or, in other words, than the value of the property destroyed by the fire, however large the interest may be, can be recovered on the policy, it rests, I think, with the pursuers to shew that it has been decided that a different rule applies, where a variety of parties and of interests hold policies over the same subjects in excess of their insurable value. But this has not been done; and in so far as authority apart from actual decision goes, there are, as it appears to me, some very decided indications of opinion in writers of reputation on this branch of the law, both in this country and in England, in favour of the views contended for by the defenders.

The passages, for instance, which are quoted from Arnould on Insurance in Lord Trayner's opinion in this case, in which opinion I substantially concur, are quite distinct, to the effect that "although there may be co-existing liens to a greater extent than the value of the subjects, there cannot be co-existing insurable interest to an aggregate amount beyond that value." And it is added,—“If this be so, then beyond such insurable interest the policy ceases to be a contract of indemnity, and the amount thus in excess is irrecoverable.” That passage is taken from the 4th edition of the work, but in the 5th and last edition it is repeated in equally decided terms; and there are other passages to the same effect (vol. i. pp. 117-119). There are also passages pointing to the same result in Mr Bunyon's work on Fire Insurance, referred to in the defenders' minute of debate.

The only writer of authority who deals with this question in Scotland, in so far as I am aware, is the late Professor Bell, who in his Commentaries (vol. i. p. 626, 5th ed.) says,—“It is not, however, strictly necessary, in order to constitute an insurable interest, that the insured should hold the absolute property of the effects insured. A creditor may have a policy on the house or goods of his debtor, over which he holds a security. A trustee or agent, having the custody of goods for sale on commission, may insure them, provided the nature of the property is distinctly specified, and that all the insurances taken together upon the same property shall not exceed the full value of it.”

No. 176.
July 16, 1887.
Glasgow Provident Investment Society v. Westminster Fire Office.

This seems to me to be a pretty distinct authority, in principle at all events, for the proposition contended for by the defenders. Policies without an interest, or taken in excess of the insurable value of the subjects, were not uncommon in the early days of insurance, and were described as being not insurances but mere wagers ; so that it became necessary for the Legislature to interfere to put a stop to them. In the passage preceding the one I have quoted from Mr Bell, he explains that when fire insurances were introduced, it was considered essential, on grounds of public policy, to extend the operation of the rules of the statutes to fire insurance. For it appears to have been felt that such insurances required to be at least as strictly guarded and dealt with in the matter of insurable interest as marine policies, and to be strictly limited as to the amount for which they might be effected over the property insured ; and I am disposed to think that the rule laid down in the passage quoted must have proceeded and been framed on that footing.

When several policies are effected on the same subjects to an amount exceeding the fair insurable value of those subjects, the insurance is, I think, without an interest in so far as regards the excess. Now that, as I read the evidence, was the position of the pursuers with regard to the policy in question. Mr M’Kinnell says that the value of the whole insurable articles destroyed by the fire amounted to £5668, and that sum was awarded by him, and paid to the prior bondholders whose policies covered the whole subjects. It is now admitted that the insurable subjects, apart from the site, which is not insurable, were never sufficient in value to meet the bonds preferable to that of the pursuers. In these circumstances, I am unable to see that at the date when the pursuers’ policy was effected there was any margin of insurable subjects available to meet the pursuers’ bond over which a valid policy could be effected. The insurance therefore was, in my opinion, in excess of the insurable value of the subjects, to the extent of the sum here claimed, and the pursuers had not therefore any proper insurable interest at the date of the fire, or even at the date of their insurance.

On the whole, therefore, I have come to the conclusion that the pursuers are not entitled to succeed in the present action.

LORD FRASER.—I am of opinion that the interlocutor of the Lord Ordinary should be adhered to, with the qualification suggested in the opinion signed by the Lord President, Lord Shand, Lord Adam, Lord Lee, and Lord Kinnear.

Insurance against sea risks has been long known, but this contract of fire insurance is one of comparatively modern origin ; and even in a recent case in England there was a controversy as to whether it was merely a contract of indemnity,—or that and something more (Castellain v. Preston, L. R. 8 Q. B. D. 613, and 11 Q. B. D. 380). Erskine has not a sentence upon fire insurance. Pothier has an elaborate disquisition upon maritime insurance, and incidentally

No. 176.

July 16, 1887.
Glasgow Pro-
vident Investment Society
v. Westminster Fire
Office.

he mentions as a novelty that in 1754 it was proposed to establish at Paris a company for the insurance of houses against fire; and he adds that he had learnt that this was carried into execution by the formation of the company ("Traité du Contrat d'Assurance," chap. 1, sect. 1). The latest editor of Pothier, writing in 1847, says that as contracts of fire insurance have not been in use in France for more than thirty years, the French Code is silent on the subject.

In 1774, Parliament (14 Geo. III c. 48), while enacting that no person shall be entitled to insure a life unless he has an interest in it, does not refer to fire insurance expressly, although the Courts have construed the Act to apply to these insurances. The enactment is, that "no insurance shall be made by any person or persons, bodies politic or corporate, on the life or lives of any person or persons, or on any other event or events whatsoever, wherein the person or persons for whose use, benefit, or on whose account such policy or policies shall be made, shall have no interest." Both in England and in Scotland, the words, "event or events," here employed, are held to apply to insurance against fire—1 Ball Com., p. 626, and Smith's Maritime Law, p. 414. This statute further enacts, "that in all cases where the insured hath interest in such life or lives, event or events, no greater sum shall be recovered or received from the insurer or insurers than the amount or value of the interest of the insured in such life or lives, or other event or events." It is clearly implied, however, that the insured shall recover up to the amount insured the full value of his interest.

Now, then, there may be a number of persons who may have an interest in the house—(1) the fiar, (2) the liferenter, (3) the holder of a ground-annual, (4) a bondholder, (5) the tenant. Each of these persons is entitled to insure his own interest; each has a distinct interest from the other. What each insures is not the house, but the risk which he runs of losing his own special interest. In the case of Castellain, the point is stated thus by Bowen (L. J.)—"It has been urged that a fire policy is not quite a contract of indemnity, and that the assured can get something more than what he has lost. It seems to me that there is no justification in authority, and I can see no foundation in reason, for any suggestion of that kind. What is it that is insured in a fire policy? Not the bricks and the materials used in building the house, but the interest of the assured in the subject-matter of insurance." No doubt the insurance company may discharge their obligation by re-erecting the house, this being the ordinary clause in the policy. If, however, this is not done, each insurance company who has insured these five different interests must pay up to each of the insured the value of the interest that is lost by the fire. It is no good answer to this to say that one of the insurance companies has indemnified one of the insurers up to the amount of the damage caused by the fire. This is not compliance with the obligation to indemnify the other insured. The obligation of the insurers is absolute, to pay to every one of the assured a sum of money on a certain event happening—viz., the destruction of the insured's interest by fire, and this without the slightest regard to the fact that the whole fire damage has been made good to one of the assured. It is a contract of wagering,—but wagering which the law, for wise reasons, sanctions, under the condition only that the insured shall have a pecuniary interest in the subject of the insurance.

The contract is undoubtedly merely a contract of indemnity; but then the question is, who is entitled to be indemnified? Indemnification does not mean the payment of the whole fire damage to one of several classes of persons interested in the property. It means indemnity to all those who have effected a lawful insurance. Each can claim no more than to the extent of his own interest, No. 176. however large may be the sum contained in his policy. But to that extent he is entitled to demand payment, limited only by the value of the property; and if he does not receive it, the contract of indemnity quoad him is broken.

Now all that remains to be ascertained is whether the pursuer of this action had such an interest. He was a bondholder, and the property on the morning before the fire was of sufficient value to carry all its burdens. The admission by the parties is, "that immediately before the date of the fire mentioned on record—viz., 1st August 1882—the value of the site, buildings, and machinery of the Greenhead Grain mills was sufficient to cover not only the prior bonds, but also the pursuers' bond."

July 16, 1887.
Glasgow Provident Investment Society
v. Westminster Fire Office.

LORD M'LAREN.—I am of opinion that the interlocutor under review ought to be affirmed, with the variation proposed in the joint opinion signed by the Lord President and other Judges.

The argument addressed to me as Lord Ordinary did not suggest to my mind the possibility of any claim at the instance of the proprietor in reversion; and therefore, in the interlocutor under review, no reference is made to his interest. But as the opinions of the Judges have been called for on the general question of the right of a second bondholder to recover to the extent of his loss, without reference to the payment previously made to a prior bondholder under his separate contract, it has been proposed that our judgment should be so expressed as to make it clear that we should not, under any circumstances, sustain a duplicate claim by the same person or persons suing in the same right. In the justice of this reservation I entirely concur.

While referring to my individual opinion delivered as Lord Ordinary in the case, I desire also to express my concurrence in the views expressed by the majority of the consulted Judges, and in their interpretation of the cases bearing upon this important question.

LORD TRAYNER.—In August 1882 a fire occurred in the Greenhead Grain Mills, by which the mills and machinery were seriously damaged. The pursuers, the Messrs Hay, the proprietors of the mills, had, previously to the fire, borrowed money from several persons, in security of which they had conveyed the mills and machinery to the several lenders. Each lender, in conjunction with the Messrs Hay, had effected an insurance or insurances over the mills and their contents, so that, at the date of the fire, the mills and their contents were insured under policies issued by the seven different insurance companies mentioned in the defenders' minute of debate. The pursuers, the Glasgow Provident Investment Society, were creditors of the Hays to the extent of about £800, and in October 1881 they, along with the Hays, insured the mills and their contents for the sum of £900 with the defenders, whose policy (on which this action is grounded) is in name of the Glasgow Provident Investment Society, and the Hays "in reversion." The whole seven policies of insurance were, as regards the statement of the insured, expressed in practically the same terms. Of these seven policies, four were held by two heritable creditors, whose claims upon the mills were preferable to the claim of the pursuers. The debts due to these two creditors at the date of the fire amounted to about £9000, and the four policies held by them represented insurance to the amount of £7485. Some time after the fire, the two heritable creditors I have referred to, with the consent and concurrence of the Hays, raised an action against the

No. 176. four offices with which they were insured, for payment of the amount of damage
 July 16, 1887. occasioned by the fire, and in that action decree was pronounced against the Glasgow Provident Investment Society v. Westminister Fire Office. defenders therein for the sum of £5668, 16s. 8d., which (by arbitration) had been ascertained and fixed as the amount of the whole of such damage. That amount has been paid. Notwithstanding of such payment, the pursuers (the Glasgow Provident Investment Society, with consent and concurrence of the Hays) now claim from the defenders, with whom they had effected their insurance, the sum of £560 as the amount of the loss which they have sustained through the injury done to the mills and machinery by the foressaid fire. The question is, whether the pursuers are entitled to decree for the sum sued for, or any part thereof.

The pursuers maintain that the result of the judgment pronounced in the action I have referred to, at the instance of the prior bondholders, with consent of the Hays, established "the principle upon which the claim in the present action rests." The same view is expressed by the Lord Ordinary in the judgment under review, and he states very precisely what that principle, in his view, is. He says,—“If the insurance companies do not reinstata, each pecuniary claim by a bondholder, or interested party, must, in my opinion, be settled just as if no other person had insured his interest in these subjects.
 This I conceive to be the principle of the decision in the previous action, and I see no difference in principle between the two cases.” I venture to think that no such “principle” was determined in the previous case, although probably such a principle might be deduced from some of the opinions there delivered.
 For my own part, I dissent from any such principle, because I regard it as not only unsupported by any authority, but as contrary to and subversive of a principle of insurance law which is well established, and to which I shall have occasion afterwards to advert. It is not necessary for me to examine here minutely what was the question raised or the decision given in the previous case, for I do not suppose it is contended that that decision was conclusive of the question now to be decided. In my opinion the two cases differ materially.
 In the former case it was decided that the owners of the mills and their heritable creditors were entitled to decree for damage done by fire against which they were insured, without the necessity of calling as parties to their action other bondholders or their insurers, and were entitled to judgment apart from all considerations of the liability of other insurers than their own to contribute to the loss sustained. In the present case the question is, whether the whole loss occasioned by the fire having already been paid, any farther claim on account of that loss can be maintained. I therefore approach the consideration of this case as one involving a question still open, and not affected favourably or unfavourably by the previous decision.

The first matter which I shall consider is, who were the insured under the policy in question; for if it can be shewn that the Hays were the insured, and not their creditors, I think it clear that the present action cannot be successfully maintained. The policy is issued in name of the Glasgow Provident Investment Society and the Messrs Hay “in reversion,” and sets forth that they had insured the property there described against loss or damage by fire. But these words by themselves do not instruct that the Investment Society were the insured. On the contrary, they shew that some other interest than theirs was involved, and that both were insured. It is plain enough, however, that both the Society and the Messrs Hay could not have the same insurable interest in the same subjects at the same time, 'because the same property cannot in value belong at the same time to two different persons.'—Per Mellish, L. J., in N. B. and Mer. Insur. Co. v. London, L. and G. Co., 5 Chan. Div. 583. Other considerations, then, must be regarded in ascertaining who were the insured under the policy. And, first of these, what was the property insured, and to whom did it belong? The property insured was the mills and machinery therein, not the debt due to the Investment Society, nor the solvency of their debtors. The mills and machinery were the property of the Messrs Hay—not the less their property that the debts due to their several creditors had been secured over it. The real security held by the creditors was not a right of property, but a right over the property by which they could, in certain circumstances, obtain payment of their debt out of it. The property, therefore, being that of the Messrs Hay, the interest to secure it against loss by fire was theirs. And if the property which was theirs—and as property theirs alone—was fully insured by them, there was no farther interest in the property insurable. Standing such an insurance, it appears to me more than doubtful whether the Investment Society could validly insure the property on any interest which was in them. But whether or not the Investment Society could validly have insured the mills while they were fully insured by the owners, it is clear enough that such additional insurance was unnecessary, because any benefit derived by the owners under their insurance would enure to the Investment Society as creditors for whose benefit (at least to the extent of their debt) the mills had been insured. If it be asked why in such circumstances the name of the Investment Society was inserted in the policy, the answer is not far to seek. If their name had not appeared on the policy, and a claim under the policy had arisen, the insurance company would have been entitled, and indeed bound, to pay over the amount of the claim to the Messrs Hay. But the insertion of the name of the Investment Society prevented the insurance company making payment of any such claim to the Hays without the consent, or at all events without notice to, the Society, who were thereby secured that no money would be paid to their debtors out of the security subjects without their having an opportunity of attaching it, if circumstances made that reasonable or necessary. In short, they were placed in the same position (but no better position) as if the Hays had insured the subjects in their own names, and assigned the policy in security. Such an assignation would not have placed the society who held it in the position of the insured under the policy, although it would have secured to them, preferably to the Hays, who were the insured, payment of any money which might be exigible in respect of any claim arising under the policy so assigned.

2. Another consideration in favour of the view that the Hays were the insured is this, that theirs was the primary and most important interest to secure. Any claim arising under a policy insuring their interest in the property could be made available to their creditors; but if the creditors' interest alone was insured, a loss might arise for which no claim under the policy could be enforced. I do not elaborate this view, because it is made very clear by the learned Judges who decided the case of Nichols & Co., printed as an appendix to the defenders' minute of debate, in whose opinions I concur.

3. If, during the currency of the defenders' policy, the debt due to the Investment Society had been paid off, the insurance would still have remained good, so long as the Hays were the owners of the mills. The paying off the

No. 176.

July 16, 1887.
Glasgow Provident Investment Society v. Westminster Fire Office.

No. 176. debt would not have affected their insurable interest, on which the policy was based.

July 16, 1887.
Glasgow Pro-
vident Investment Society
v. Westminster Fire
Office.

4. Further, the insurance in question was effected by the Hays. They were (in accordance with general practice) taken bound by their bond to the Investment Society to insure the subjects, and they did so. The whole premiums of insurance were admittedly paid by the Hays.

On these considerations I come to the conclusion that under the policy in question the Hays, and not the Investment Society, were the insured. On the same grounds I am of opinion that the Hays must be regarded as the insured in the whole seven policies effected over their mills, current at the date of the fire. The whole policies stand in simili casu so far as the statement of the insured is concerned.

Assuming, then, that the Hays are the insured under the policy in question, what is the extent of their claim? I take it to be an elementary principle in the law of insurance, that the insured cannot under any circumstances recover more than the amount of his loss. "The very foundation, in my opinion, of every rule which has been applied to insurance law is this, namely, that the contract of insurance contained in a marine or fire policy is a contract of indemnity, and of indemnity only; and that this contract means that the assured, in case of a loss against which the policy has been made, shall be fully indemnified, but shall never be more than fully indemnified. That is the fundamental principle of insurance; and if ever a proposition is brought forward which is at variance with it—that is to say, which will either prevent the assured from obtaining a full indemnity, or which will give to the assured more than a full indemnity, that proposition must certainly be wrong"—(Per Brett, L. J., in Castellain v. Preston, 11 Q. B. Div. 386). It is not difficult to apply this rule of law to the present case. The damage done to the insured by the fire insured against is ascertained to be £5668, 16s. 8d. That money has been paid to the insured—the Messrs Hay. I say paid to the Messrs Hay, because it is not the less paid to them that it has gone into the pockets of some of their creditors. It was paid to the persons who received it with the concurrence of the Hays, and it has reduced the debt of the Hays to that extent. That which goes to reduce their debt makes them so much the richer, or so much the less indebted, which is the same thing. But if the Hays have already received the full amount of the damage done by the fire, what farther claim can they have in respect of alleged damage done by the same fire? The Lord Ordinary in this case has decreed in favour of the pursuers for £560. If that amount be added to what has already been paid, then it appears that the assured will receive the sum of £6228, 16s. 8d. in respect of the damage done by the fire, being just £560 in excess of the whole damage sustained. I venture to think that a judgment producing that result "must certainly be wrong." If the principle of that judgment was sustained, and there were a sufficient number of separate insurances, the Messrs Hay might easily find themselves very largely enriched by the burning of their premises. But that would not be in accordance with the view that an assured "shall be fully indemnified, but shall never be more than fully indemnified."

The Lord Ordinary admits the rule of law, "that an assured person can in no case recover more than an indemnity for his individual loss." He would therefore agree with me, I suppose, that the present claim could not be enforced if the Hays were the only persons who were insured, seeing that they have received payment already of the whole loss occasioned by the fire. But, holding that there are here several persons insured, he reaches the conclusion given effect No. 176.

 to in his judgment, on the principle I have already alluded to, namely, that where several persons insure the same subjects, having different interests, each is entitled (where there has been no reinstatement) to claim, "just as if no other person had insured his interest in these subjects." Consistently with this view the Lord Ordinary disputes the proposition as "a universal proposition in the law of insurance that no more can be recovered in the aggregate by the different persons or interests insured than the amount of the fire damage"—a proposition which he says has not been shewn to have been "received into our law." I concede that there is no decision reported in our books which affirms the proposition thus disputed; but equally there is no decision which negatives it.
 The question does not appear to have been presented for decision before the present time, which is somewhat surprising (for the case must have happened before) if the proposition is unsound. Not surprising, however, if the proposition has hitherto been recognised as sound; and it is perhaps worth observing that the proposition was conceded by the counsel for the insured in the previous case (11 Rettie, 296). There is some authority, however, for the proposition.
 "A mortgager and mortgagee of the same ship may each effect an insurance on the vessel, and, if he pleases, each may cover the vessel to her full value. The sum recoverable under each seems to be such an amount as, when added to the other, would equal the full value of the vessel and no more."—(Arnould on Insurance, 4th ed. p. 107.) "Although there may be co-existing liens to a greater amount than the value of the subjects, there cannot be co-existing insurable interests to an aggregate amount beyond that value. If this be so, then beyond such insurable interest the policy ceases to be a contract of indemnity, and the amount thus in excess is irrecoverable."—(Arnould on Insurance, 4th
 ed. p. 108.) "Whilst policies like liens may overlie the subject in numbers to an aggregate amount exceeding indefinitely the value of it, the right to recover on all of them together in respect of any one loss is restricted by the principle of indemnity that underlies the contract, to the ascertained or agreed worth of the subject."—(Arnould on Insurance, 4th ed. p. 109.) Or, if the destruction of the subject be partial instead of total (it is of total loss the author quoted is evidently speaking), then the whole loss can only once be recovered, no matter how many are the liens or policies that overlie it, for the principle of indemnity is the same, whether the loss is total or partial. The same principle is recognised by Lord Justice Mellish in the case I have already cited. He says,—"Where different persons insure the same property in respect of their different rights, they may be divided into two classes. It may be that the interest of the two between them makes up the whole property, as in the case of a tenant for life and remainderman. Then, if each insures, although they may use words apparently insuring the whole property, yet they would recover from their respective insurance companies the value of their own interests, and of course those values added together would make up the value of the whole property."
 "But then there may be cases where although two different persons insured in respect of different rights, each of them can recover the whole, as in the case of a mortgagor and mortgagee." Obviously the learned Judge meant that either of the parties in the case supposed could recover the whole, and not both, for he adds,—"But whenever that is the case, it will necessarily follow that one of these two has a remedy over against the other, because the same property cannot in value belong at the same time to two different persons."—(5 Chan. Div. 583.)

July 16, 1887.
 Glasgow Pro-
 vident Investment Society
 v. Westminster Fire
 Office.

No. 176.

July 16, 1887.
Glasgow Pro-
vident Investment Society
v. Westminster Fire
Office.

mills which were burned, had borrowed large sums of money upon the security of their property, and had granted bonds for the amount ; and, in conjunction with the various creditors in those bonds, they had from time to time effected policies of insurance over the property with seven different insurance companies for the aggregate sum of about £9200. These policies were all taken in substantially the same terms, in favour of the respective creditors in the bonds, and of the proprietors, Messrs Hay, in reversion ; and were, as I understand, effected under the obligation usually imposed upon proprietors in such cases, to insure their property at their own expense, and pay the premiums as they became due. The premiums in the policy here in question were paid by the Messrs Hay, as explained by one of themselves in his evidence in this case ; and he also states that he furnished the information of the particulars on which the policy was effected, as specified on the margin of the policy.

Shortly after the fire, certain creditors, who were the holders of the first set of these policies, and whose securities were preferable to that of the present pursuers, brought the action to which we have been referred (11 R. p. 287) against the insurance companies with whom their policies had been effected, for payment of the sums due in respect of the damage done by the fire. That action was raised with the consent of Messrs Hay, who are also pursuers in the present case ; and after a variety of procedure, and an arbitration entered into to ascertain the amount of the loss and damage occasioned by the fire, the total loss so occasioned was found to amount to £5668, 16s. 8d., for which decree was pronounced in favour of the pursuers of that action, which was brought with concurrence of the Messrs Hay.

That this sum was the full amount of the damage done by the fire, and recoverable under the policies then sued on, is very clearly proved by Mr M'Kinnell, who acted as oversman in the arbitration, and was examined in this case on the part of the pursuers, who says,—“ I was oversman in the reference between the Scottish Amicable, the first bondholders, and the first insurance companies : I awarded the sum which I found the companies liable to pay as the sum that would be required to restore the place . . . I think the allowances I awarded for buildings, machinery, and rent were the full value of the loss. It was upon that footing that I awarded them . . . (Q.) Even if the insurances had been higher, would you have given more for the machinery, or have you given its full value ? I gave its full value. The sums I gave were sufficient to reinstate the mills as a first-class job.”

The sum, therefore, which was so awarded under the first action was the amount of the whole loss occasioned by the fire, and the full measure of the indemnity recoverable from the insurance companies in respect of that fire ; and it went to relieve the Messrs Hay to the extent of £5668 of the debt which they owed to the creditors with whom they were conjoined as pursuers of that action. That there was no further sum, in the shape of loss caused by the fire, available for distribution either among those preferable creditors, or among the holders of any of the other policies, is, I think, clear from the evidence I have quoted, when taken in connection with article third of the admissions, recently adjusted, which bears (3d) “ That the insurable subjects—viz, the buildings and machinery, apart from the site, were never sufficient in value to meet the bonds prior to the pursuers’.” That the site or area is not an insurable subject is distinctly laid down by Mr Bell in his Commentaries (vol. i. p. 628), where he says,—“ The loss is estimated on the destructible parts ; or the whole value of the house, as it would have sold in the market, is taken, deducting the value of the area." No. 176.

Such being the result of the arbitration, and of the admission of parties as to the value of the insurable subjects, it seems to me to be pretty clear, that when the policy now sued on was effected in October 1881, the present pursuers were mistaken in supposing that there remained any margin of insurable property belonging to the Hays, over which a good additional insurance could be effected, after satisfying the claims that might be made under the policies which were then held by the preferable creditors of the Hays, and which covered the whole insurable subjects. Upon the evidence there was no such margin. So that if the pursuers were to obtain decree for the sum now claimed, they would be paid £560 more than the full value of the insurable subjects destroyed, over part of which their policy is said to have been effected, and the Messrs Hay would in this way be relieved of debt to the extent of £560 more than the fair value of the property they were entitled to insure in October 1881, and so to obtain from the defenders £560 more than the value of what was lost by the fire.

July 16, 1887.
Glasgow Provident Investment Society v. Westminster Fire Office.

Now if such a claim as this had been made by the Messrs Hay, the owners of the mills, upon policies effected by them as proprietors on their own account, it must, as I conceive, have as a matter of course been rejected. It is trite law, as I have always understood, that no man is entitled to recover, under a fire insurance policy, more than the value of the subjects insured which are destroyed by the fire. This is distinctly stated in most, if not in all, text writers on the subject; and it is very clearly laid down by the late Lord Moncreiff in various parts of his charge to the jury in the case of the Hercules Insurance Company, July 1836 (14 Sh. p. 1137), and more particularly where he says (p. 1142), "The rule is that you can get nothing but indemnification for the thing lost, and that you can get nothing more than the value of the thing lost."

It is accordingly, as I understand the case, not disputed in argument for the pursuers, that if the Messrs Hay had themselves effected all these policies, or had effected one policy for the gross amount, and endeavoured to recover more than the amount of the actual loss occasioned by the fire, they would not have been entitled to succeed. But it is said that this is not the position of matters to be here dealt with; that it is the investment company who are the real pursuers, and that the Messrs Hay are nothing more than mere concurreurs for their interest. I am unable to accede to this view. It appears to me, on the contrary, that the Messrs Hay are substantially the effectors of the policy sued on, and the parties most materially interested in the result of this action. They are the proprietors of the subjects, and although they have had to borrow largely upon the property, the reversionary or radical right is still in them, and they had the material interest to insure it. Under the arrangement between them and the investment company, moreover, they were bound to insure the property, and to keep it insured.

The usual course in such cases, I believe, is for the proprietor to insure, assigning the policy to his creditor, in order to enable him to take such steps as may be necessary for keeping up the policy, and securing the sum due under it, if he has any reason to think the proprietor may fail in his duty in that respect. Instead of doing this, however, in the present case, the policy has by arrangement been here taken in the joint names of the parties. But it was still essentially the Messrs Hay's insurance, and, as explained in the evidence, the whole premiums have been paid by them. By means of the first four of the policies, their debts to the extent of £5668 have been paid; and should a further recovery be made under the present action, the sum recovered will go to relieve them still further of their debts. The policy is therefore essentially their policy, and I cannot look upon the other pursuers in any more favourable light, or in any different position than that of the holders of an assignation to a policy effected in name of the proprietors of the property insured. In that case the assignees would, as I apprehend, be in law in the precise same position as their cedents, as regards their right to enforce payment of the sum claimed under the present action, which appears to me to amount substantially to a claim for a double or excessive insurance of a considerable amount. To allow the Investment Society in such circumstances to recover the sum sued for, would in effect be to allow the Hays to obtain payment under the name of the Society of a claim which, under their own name, and as in their own right, they would not have been entitled to enforce.

No. 176.

July 16, 1887.
Glasgow Provident Investment Society v. Westminster Fire Office.

But, even assuming that the Investment Society had here some kind of interest to insure separate from that of the Messrs Hay, I am of opinion that they are not entitled to recover the sum claimed in this action, because I concur in the opinion expressed by Lord Young in the case of the Scottish Equitable Company, to the effect that, where various parties or interests are insured over the same subjects, the insurances taken together must not exceed the fair insurable value of those subjects, and that if insurances in excess of value are effected, no more can be recovered in respect of those policies, in the event of fire, than the value of the loss caused by the fire.

It is said that there is no authority for this proposition; and there is, I believe, no decided case to that effect. Neither is there any direct decision to the contrary; and having regard to the fact that the rule is express, that where a variety of policies are effected in one name over the same subjects in excess of the insurable value, no more than the actual loss, or, in other words, than the value of the property destroyed by the fire, however large the interest may be, can be recovered on the policy, it rests, I think, with the pursuers to shew that it has been decided that a different rule applies, where a variety of parties and of interests hold policies over the same subjects in excess of their insurable value. But this has not been done; and in so far as authority apart from actual decision goes, there are, as it appears to me, some very decided indications of opinion in writers of reputation on this branch of the law, both in this country and in England, in favour of the views contended for by the defenders.

The passages, for instance, which are quoted from Arnould on Insurance in Lord Trayner's opinion in this case, in which opinion I substantially concur, are quite distinct, to the effect that "although there may be co-existing liens to a greater extent than the value of the subjects, there cannot be co-existing insurable interest to an aggregate amount beyond that value." And it is added,—“If this be so, then beyond such insurable interest the policy ceases to be a contract of indemnity, and the amount thus in excess is irrecoverable.” That passage is taken from the 4th edition of the work, but in the 5th and last edition it is repeated in equally decided terms; and there are other passages to the same effect (vol. i. pp. 117-119). There are also passages pointing to the same result in Mr Bunyon's work on Fire Insurance, referred to in the defenders' minute of debate.

The only writer of authority who deals with this question in Scotland, in so far as I am aware, is the late Professor Bell, who in his Commentaries (vol. i. p. 626, 5th ed.) says,—“It is not, however, strictly necessary, in order to constitute an insurable interest, that the insured should hold the absolute property of the effects insured. A creditor may have a policy on the house or goods of his debtor, over which he holds a security. A trustee or agent, having the custody of goods for sale on commission, may insure them, provided the nature of the property is distinctly specified, and that all the insurances taken together upon the same property shall not exceed the full value of it.”

No. 176.
July 16, 1887.
Glasgow Provident Investment Society v. Westminster Fire Office.

This seems to me to be a pretty distinct authority, in principle at all events, for the proposition contended for by the defenders. Policies without an interest, or taken in excess of the insurable value of the subjects, were not uncommon in the early days of insurance, and were described as being not insurances but mere wagers; so that it became necessary for the Legislature to interfere to put a stop to them. In the passage preceding the one I have quoted from Mr Bell, he explains that when fire insurances were introduced, it was considered essential, on grounds of public policy, to extend the operation of the rules of the statutes to fire insurance. For it appears to have been felt that such insurances required to be at least as strictly guarded and dealt with in the matter of insurable interest as marine policies, and to be strictly limited as to the amount for which they might be effected over the property insured; and I am disposed to think that the rule laid down in the passage quoted must have proceeded and been framed on that footing.

When several policies are effected on the same subjects to an amount exceeding the fair insurable value of those subjects, the insurance is, I think, without an interest in so far as regards the excess. Now that, as I read the evidence, was the position of the pursuers with regard to the policy in question. Mr M’Kinnell says that the value of the whole insurable articles destroyed by the fire amounted to £5668, and that sum was awarded by him, and paid to the prior bondholders whose policies covered the whole subjects. It is now admitted that the insurable subjects, apart from the site, which is not insurable, were never sufficient in value to meet the bonds preferable to that of the pursuers. In these circumstances, I am unable to see that at the date when the pursuers’ policy was effected there was any margin of insurable subjects available to meet the pursuers’ bond over which a valid policy could be effected. The insurance therefore was, in my opinion, in excess of the insurable value of the subjects, to the extent of the sum here claimed, and the pursuers had not therefore any proper insurable interest at the date of the fire, or even at the date of their insurance.

On the whole, therefore, I have come to the conclusion that the pursuers are not entitled to succeed in the present action.

LORD FRASER.—I am of opinion that the interlocutor of the Lord Ordinary should be adhered to, with the qualification suggested in the opinion signed by the Lord President, Lord Shand, Lord Adam, Lord Lee, and Lord Kinnear.

Insurance against sea risks has been long known, but this contract of fire insurance is one of comparatively modern origin; and even in a recent case in England there was a controversy as to whether it was merely a contract of indemnity,—or that and something more (Castellain v. Preston, L. R. 8 Q. B. D. 613, and 11 Q. B. D. 380). Erskine has not a sentence upon fire insurance. Pothier has an elaborate disquisition upon maritime insurance, and incidentally

No. 176.

July 16, 1887.
Glasgow Pro-
vident Investment Society
v. Westminster Fire
Office.

4. That the pursuers have proved no loss by reason of the fire.

I am of opinion that all of these propositions are unfounded, and I shall shortly explain the grounds on which I reach that conclusion.

I think I may assume it as certain, in the law of fire insurance, that the holder of an heritable security over his debtor's premises has an interest in the premises which is insurable. I know no reason for doubting that general proposition; and certainly the defenders saw none when, in the full knowledge of the pursuers' position, they promised to reimburse them, and were paid for doing so. In all the cases which have been cited that proposition has been assumed, and especially in the very interesting remarks of Sir G. Jessel in the case of the North British and Mercantile Company, 5 Ch. Div. 569.

It appears equally indisputable that the pursuers might insure for their own interest only, and acquire by so doing a direct right of action against the defenders, without any regard to the separate interest of the owners of the premises. It is no doubt true that when a creditor insures his debtor's premises his interest will terminate if his debt terminates. It is also true, although quite irrelevant to this matter, that any increase in the debtor's funds, by insurances or otherwise, may increase the creditor's chance of payment. But these considerations are quite apart from any question we have here. The obligation in the policy is distinct, and is precisely the same as it would have been although the owners had been no parties to the contract. That the latter are only parties for the reversion seems clear enough on the terms of the instrument, and the reversion means what remains over when the creditor has been indemnified.

But it is maintained, secondly, that even if the pursuers had an insurable interest, they did not insure it by this policy; that it conferred no right on the pursuers, and imposed no direct obligation on the defenders; that it was a contract solely for the interest of the owners, and that any interest the pursuers might have in it was incidental and subordinate to the paramount right of the Messrs Hay.

I can find nothing like this in the terms of the contract; on the contrary, I find words of obligation utterly inconsistent with any such construction. The policy says "jointly and severally, in reversion," but it seems not subject to doubt that the owners became parties only for the reversion, after any claim of their creditor was satisfied, and accordingly they are not pursuers in this action, but only give their consent and concurrence to it.

What seems to have suggested this plea is the fact—a very usual one in such cases—that the owners undertook to pay the premiums on the policy as they fell due. This undertaking was of course to the advantage of the creditors, as improving their security. But with that the defenders had no concern. That obligation was the subject of a contract between the bondholders and their debtors, to which the defenders were no parties, and in which they had not the slightest interest. The contract of insurance was contingent on payment of the premium, and it was wholly immaterial to any interest of the defenders which of them paid it. There is nothing in this consideration which in any degree alters the relation of the Investment Company and the defenders as respectively creditors and debtors under the policy.

Apart from this, the struggle to represent the Messrs Hay as the sole insurers seems to me baseless. The Investment Company had the same rights against the defenders which they would have had if the Hays had been no parties to the policy. The latter could not have dealt or transacted in any way with the interest of the Investment Company without their consent, except indeed by paying their debt. The owners could not have interposed between their creditor and the obligation of the insurance company; neither could they have discharged it. They joined in the policy for the same reason as that for which they consent to and concur in this action—to secure, in the first instance, indemnity to their creditor.

No. 176.

July 16, 1887.
Glasgow Pro-
vident Investment Society
v. Westminster Fire
Office.

The third argument maintained by the defenders is one which alone has an aspect of novelty. It is contended that even admitting that this policy was entered into by the Investment Company, and that they had an insurable interest, they have no right to recover, because the debt constituted by the policy has been already paid. It is said that another insurance company, under a contract with a third party, has paid to that third party the full insurance value of the premises insured by this policy; and that thereby the obligation incurred by the defenders has been fulfilled.

This is hardly a satisfactory mode of payment for the pursuers. It means that in this, which is called a contract of indemnity, the pursuers, although they prove their loss, are not to receive a single shilling, while the defenders, the obligees, are to keep the premiums. The categories to which the defenders try to assimilate this case furnish no analogy. We are referred to the rules, quite equitable in themselves, introduced to prevent over-insurance, or over-recovery, when the same risk has been insured by the same person more than once. Thus, when the same interest is insured in different offices, the insurance office which has paid the indemnity to the policy-holder has, or may have, a right of contribution against the others, who have not paid. Here, of course, there is no such case, as the Investment Company held no second insurance. In like manner, if the assured, having received full indemnification, retains any separate or collateral right in diminution of the loss, the insurer who has paid him may claim to stand in his place as regards such rights, on the ground of subrogation. But these rules can only be applied to cases in which indemnity has been made. Their rationale implies that while the contract is one for securing full indemnity to the assured, it is not in accordance with the good faith on which it proceeds that it should be so used as to give the assured more than indemnity. But I am at a loss to see how either of these principles can avail the defenders here, when neither restitution nor compensation has been made, and the defenders are to retain all the premiums which have been paid, while their creditors are to receive nothing in return. No decision has been referred to, and I know of none, which could give countenance to a result so manifestly inequitable.

Under the policy the defenders had the option, of which they have not availed themselves, of reinstating the premises. If they or the combined offices had chosen, as they very reasonably might, to adopt that course, they would have recompensed all concerned, insured or uninsured; and it is both good law and good sense that a man should not be paid for an injury the whole effect of which has been effaced and obliterated. But it does not seem to be good sense, and I do not think it is law, that when there has been no reinstatement, and no indemnification, when the alleged loss remains unrepaired and unrecompensed, it shall be assumed, contrary to the fact, that the sufferer has been indemnified, because someone else has paid someone else, under contracts

No. 176. entirely separate a sum sufficient for reinstatement, which has not been so applied.

July 16, 1887.
Glasgow Pro-
vident Investment Society
v. Westminster Fire
Office.

It seems to be supposed, rather fancifully, that in a question about fire insurance, the ordinary incidents of contract are superseded, and that the creditor rights of the assured can be affected by transactions to which they are not parties. I had occasion to indicate my view of this doctrine in the case of the Northern Assurance Company, 11 R. 287, which was lately before us. I still retain those views, and I am glad to find so much confirmation of them in the opinions of the majority of the consulted Judges. It is not, in my opinion, reasonable to consider the aggregate value of the injury done by the fire as a specific and limited fund to be divided among the assured, however varied and separate their contracts and their interests; or to assume that when this aggregate sum has been exhausted by payment by any insurance company to any policyholder, all other contracts under which the same premises were assured must be held to be fulfilled. I agree with the opinion of the majority that there is neither authority nor principle for this view. The defenders are sued on their obligation, and they must answer on it in the usual way.

On these general views I concur in the results at which the majority of the consulted Judges have arrived. It remains to come to a conclusion on a question with which the consulted Judges who form the majority have not dealt,—the amount due to the pursuers on the footing that these views are sound.

If I understand the argument for the defenders aright, they maintain that, even on that assumption, there is nothing due to the pursuers. It seems to be alleged that the prior securities burdening the property would have left nothing for the pursuers, even if the fire had not taken place. But the fact is otherwise. It is admitted by the minute of admissions that before the fire the value of the buildings, including the site, machinery, &c., was sufficient to have met all the burdens on them; and that they have only been reduced below that value by reason of the effect of the fire on the buildings and plant. The indemnity therefore stipulated in the policy means the reparation of the loss so sustained, subject of course to the conditions of the policy. That the site was not insured or insurable does not affect this result in any way. The interest which the pursuers have under the policy is, that this portion of the subject of their security which has been destroyed or damaged by the fire, shall be replaced, either specifically or by payment.

It is quite true that the policy contains a specification of the different portions of the premises to which the insurance applies, and an allocation of the values attributable to each. I do not understand the pursuers to dispute that they are bound by this allocation; and accordingly their summons does not conclude for the whole sum assured, but for a sum of £565, considerably short of it. Their claim, therefore, must be held to be not for the whole amount of their debt, £900, but for the value of those portions of the premises which are specified in the policy, and which were destroyed or actually affected by the fire; and that at the value allocated on them in the policy. Of these, two items, of the value of £120 and £190, are admitted in the answer to the 4th article of the pursuers' condescendence to be rightly claimed. The Lord Ordinary has sustained the amount demanded in the summons to the extent of the full sum of £565. I have not been able to follow the views by which he arrives at that result. The only farther sums which are admitted are three items contained in the second last column of the valuation printed in appendix A, which I understand to have been held as evidence. These amount to about £40, which I propose we should admit, making the amount due £350; and with this qualification I am for adhering to the Lord Ordinary's interlocutor.

The consulted Judges have expressed an opinion that the Messrs Hay are not entitled to any individual decree, and our interlocutor will so bear.

The defenders have pleaded that for any sum to be found due they are entitled to an assignation as against the Messrs Hay. On that, if they desire it, they will be heard.

LORD YOUNG.—In the case of The Scottish Amicable, 11 R. 287, I formed and expressed the opinion that when property is burdened with debt no more can be done by fire insurance (in the common and familiar form) for the indemnity of the owner and his creditors against damage by fire than will be effected by a policy in name of the owner with a provision satisfactory to the creditors that payment shall be made to them according to their rights and preferences. I thought it immaterial to the insurers' liability whether the creditors are conjoined with the owner in the policy or not, being of opinion that in any question with the insurers the interests of the owner and of his creditors are indistinguishable. Creditors have no right or interest in their debtor's property except what he has given to them to the exactly corresponding diminution of his own. When, therefore, a proprietor contracts debt, and gives security over his property, which is forthwith insured against fire by him and his creditors in conjunction, I could not regard the policy by which such insurance is effected as differing in legal character or in the liability which it imposes on the insurers from a policy in similar terms and for the same amount, to an unburdened proprietor. Had this opinion prevailed, the seven fire policies which the Messrs Hay, in conjunction with their several creditors, had effected upon their mill and machinery would, with the parties thereto, have been brought together into Court, and if reinstatement was not ordered, which (the insurers desiring it) I rather think it would have been as the fairest thing to all concerned, the amount of the fire damage due by the insurers would have been ascertained, and paid and distributed according to the rights and preferences of the insured inter se, with which obviously the insurers had no concern. It did not prevail, however, the majority of the Court being of opinion that each of the seven policies was an individual independent contract, and that there was no legal connection or relation amongst them. The parties insured by four of the seven policies were pursuers in that case, and had decree for the money value of the whole fire damage to the property thereby insured.

The action now before us is upon another of these seven policies—the fifth that has been sued on. The parties insured by this policy are the Messrs Hay (the proprietors) and the Glasgow Investment Society, a creditor of theirs, holding a security from them over the property thereby insured. Its terms are indistinguishable from those of any of the four policies formerly sued on, and I am unable to resist the pursuers' argument that it is as independent of these four as they were of it, or to put the proposition, as indeed the pursuers do, quite distinctly, that in dealing with the claim under this policy we have, according to the principle of our former decision, no concern with the four policies previously before the Court, and can take no account of anything done or paid under them. In the former case we assumed—I daresay truly in point of fact—that the creditors insured (along with their debtor) by the four policies

No. 176.

July 16, 1887.
Glasgow Provident Investment Society
v. Westminster Fire Office.

No. 176. then sued on were prior and preferable to those insured by the other three. But, as I pointed out at the time, we had neither parties nor materials, nor even averments on record, to enable or entitle us to give a decision to that effect and the principle of the judgment would, in my opinion, have led to the same result had the creditors then suing been postponed creditors, or even not creditors at all, for had they been strangers the consent of the owners of the burnt property (and they were parties to the policies and also to the action on them) entitled them to decree for whatever sums the insurers were owing under these policies.

July 16, 1887.
Glasgow Provident Investment Society v. Westminster Fire Office.

We thought it fitting that the principle on which we (by a majority) proceeded in the former case—that of The Scottish Amicable—should be reconsidered, with the assistance of all our brethren, in this case, which involves the practical application of it, and the extent to which it must be carried if admitted at all. In the former case the contention of the Scottish Amicable Association was that as first, and so preferable, creditors to an amount exceeding the fire damage they were entitled to the whole without reference to subsequent and postponed creditors, who, according to the rules of law which govern the rights of creditors inter se, could not compete with them. I have indicated why I thought that we could not regularly sustain this contention, either in fact or law, in the absence of the creditors alleged to be subsequent and postponed, and so excluded from participation. But in this case the Glasgow Investment Society, admitting that they are subsequent and postponed creditors, contend that they have no concern with the prior and preferable creditors, or with the fact that the whole fire damage has been paid to them. This contention obviously involves important questions beyond that which we had to consider in the former case.

And I venture in the outset to say that I am averse to waste time by considering the quite fanciful case of a fire insurance effected on property by a creditor independently of his debtor the owner. Such an insurance probably never has existed, and I should think never will, although it is sufficient to say that we have none such to deal with now. The policy before us is to the Glasgow Investment Society (the creditor) and the Messrs Hay (the owner) in conjunction, payable to the former primarily and to the latter in reversion, and thus subsisted from the first, and subsists now according to its terms, quite irrespective of the debt of the Investment Society, which the insurers have, so far as I see, no title whatever to inquire into. A creditor may possibly, or certainly, lawfully insure against any special risk to which he (as distinguished from his debtor and other creditors) is exposed, but this must be by a special insurance proposed to and accepted by the insurers. So also an owner may insure specially against special risks, such as, for example, the stoppage or destruction of his business, or liability in damages for breach of contracts which a fire may disable him from performing. A familiar instance of such special insurance—so familiar that it occurs in most fire policies—is rent, which is interpreted to mean the loss from deprivation of the use of premises from the time of a fire till they can be made fit for occupation again. This loss, although always accompanying a fire, is, I need not say, not included by implication, but must be specially insured. We have here to deal with a common fire policy on combustible property, without anything special in it, except only the now all but universal special insurance of rent.

It seems to me reasonable to impute to the insurers knowledge of the fact that the Messrs Hay were the owners in actual occupation of the insured premises in which they carried on business, that being such a fact as all fire insurance offices look to, inasmuch as it affects the risk. But what occasion had they to concern themselves with the relation between the Messrs Hay and the Glasgow Investment Society? They probably assumed it to be that of debtor and creditor, it seemed so likely; but it was no concern of theirs what it was, or whether it should continue or not. I only notice this in passing, for I shall not dwell on the topic, but I am quite unable to see how the existence or extent of the liability of the insurance office by virtue of the policy could be dependent on or affected by the relation subsisting between the Investment Society and the Messrs Hay at the date of the policy, or anything transacted or done between them subsequently. Whatever should become due by the policy was to be paid to the Investment Society (and you might substitute A B) primo loco, and to the Messrs Hay in reversion. It was to the office matter of indifference to whom they paid, and I can find no reason for thinking that the amount payable by them could be different according as the demand was made by the one or the other.

No. 176.

July 16, 1887.
Glasgow Provident Investment Society
v. Westminster Fire Office.

In the former case (that at the instance of the Scottish Amicable Association) four policies in four offices were sued on, but were, I think, properly dealt with exactly as one policy in one office would have been, in so far as regarded the amount of fire damage due and payable. One of them (for £500) was in name of J. A. Robertson, the manager of the Association, but it was represented to us, I presume truly, that it was really to the Association. So taken, the Scottish Amicable Association were creditors of the Messrs Hay for £7485, and held first and preferable securities to that amount over their mills and machinery at Greenhead. By the four policies to which I have referred they were insured to that amount against fire on the subjects of their securities—that is, such of them as were so insurable, viz., the combustible parts which were inventoried, and the several parts separately valued in the policies.

In their action on these four policies (in conjunction with the Messrs Hay) they had decree for £5668 as the ascertained amount of the whole fire damage, the several offices agreeing among themselves as to their contributions. The fire occurred on 1st August 1882, and the pursuers in this case (the Glasgow Investment Society and the Messrs Hay) claim as due to them on their policy from the defenders (the Westminster Fire Office) the damage by the same fire to certain property thereby insured. Had this property not been included in the insurance by the Scottish Amicable (and the Messrs Hay), and had the damage to it by the fire of 1st August not been paid to them as owners and prior and preferable creditors, there could have been no defence to the present action except upon the amount demanded. But it was so included, and the fire damage to it so paid. The question then occurs, Whether when property is insured by the owner and one of his creditors, being a first and preferable creditor, and the whole damage to it by a certain fire has been paid to them, and the same property is insured by the same owner in conjunction with another creditor, being a postponed creditor, anything, and if so, how much, is recoverable under the latter insurance in respect of the same fire?

The case is not one of double insurance in any sense. It is not alleged—and there is no reason for thinking—that the Messrs Hay's property was in whole, or with respect to any item of it, insured beyond its fair insurable value when all the insurances were added together. Their system seems to have been to insure to the amount of each debt as it was contracted or adjusted and security

No. 176. granted for it, and if, therefore, the property fairly carried the debts it was fairly insurable to the aggregate amount of the debts. Had one policy been substituted for the seven, insuring the same amount on each item of property, and the aggregate of all the items been the same, viz., £9255 (the amount of debt on the property, and which it fairly carried), there could have been no suggestion of double insurance. Whether the creditors were named or not in this (supposed) policy for £9255, they would have been primarily interested in it according to their rights inter se, and with interests which could not have been defeated or baffled anyhow without fraud on the part of their debtor and gross neglect on their own.

July 16, 1887.
Glasgow Provident Investment Society
v. Westminster Fire Office.

The general question is interesting, and having been thought of sufficient magnitude to be submitted to the consideration of all the Judges, and to be argued before them both in writing and orally, I hope to be pardoned if, in explaining the grounds on which I am compelled to differ from the views of the great majority of my brethren, I venture to begin by submitting some very general and comprehensive propositions in the law of fire insurance which I regard as elementary, but which I think have been, some of them overlooked, and others violated by my learned brethren. The difference between their views and mine is fundamental, and I should desire to bring the difference to the test of as close and exhaustive reasoning as I can.

The primary obligation of insurers by a fire policy is a money obligation. It is to pay in money to the assured the damage by fire to the property insured. There is indeed usually a stipulation for an option to reinstate, but that is a mere precaution against fraudulent or exorbitant claims, and when not exercised does not affect the money obligation, which must be measured and fulfilled exactly as if there were no option.

To this money obligation there are three limits, viz., 1st, the sum insured on the property; 2d, the damage to the property by fire; and 3d, the damage suffered in consequence by the assured. And the liability of the insurers can in no case exceed the least of the three. It cannot of course exceed the sum insured, while it may and must fall short of it to the extent that the fire damage falls short of it. Further, it cannot exceed the fire damage to the property, while it may and, on the principle of indemnity, must fall short of it to the extent that the consequent loss or damage to the assured falls short of it. This principle of indemnity may thus limit the liability of the insurer to pay within the two limits—of sum insured and fire damage—(or even extinguish it), but cannot possibly extend it beyond the least of them.

These are familiar rules, and I have thought it proper to express them only because I think some of the learned Judges have not had them sufficiently in view in considering this case. It occurred to me at least that the language which they use indicates an impression that the principle of indemnity may extend the insurers' liability beyond the fire damage to the property insured. The decisions and judicial dicta regarding this principle, which these Judges refer to, all relate to claims within the admitted amount of fire damage to the property, and which were resisted only on the ground that the assured had not been damaged up to that amount, or at all; as does also some judicial language to the effect that it is really not the property but the interest in its preservation that is insured—language which has a quite sensible meaning for the purpose for which it was used, but is grossly misunderstood if supposed to signify that insurers may be liable beyond the amount of the fire damage to the property where the assured has suffered damage beyond that amount, which is a very common case No. 176.

indeed.

The first thing to be done when insured property is damaged by fire is to ascertain the amount or just estimate of the damage in money. The consequent injury to the assured, which may limit or extinguish his right to recover, is generally a subsequent question—and indeed always, except in the rare case where the assured has so obviously sustained no loss, having no interest in the property at the time of the fire, that it would be idle to inquire about the extent to which it had been damaged.

July 16, 1887.
Glasgow Provident Investment Society v. Westminster Fire Office.

Now, I venture to assert that the money value or estimate of the damage by a given fire to any given property cannot be affected by the character or extent of the assured's interest in it, but must be absolutely the same for anybody and everybody. The right to payment is another matter, and will, as I have said, be affected by the interest of the assured and the damage thereto consequent on the damage to the property, which it can never exceed, although it may fall short of it to any amount.

The rule for estimating fire damage to property is quite fixed. In the case of total destruction it is the market value at the date of the fire, and in the case of partial damage it is the depreciation of that market value by the action of the fire (or of the means used to extinguish it), or, which amounts to the same thing, the sum necessary to repair the damage. This is what the insurer of property against fire by a common fire policy, for I speak of no other, undertakes to pay, but always within the limits I have already expressed, viz., 1st, the sum insured, and 2d, the damage to the interest of the assured.

It is, I should have thought before this case occurred, unnecessary to observe that no allowance is made for breaking an assortment. Where each of a catalogue or inventory of subjects or articles of property is insured for a distinct sum, nothing can be allowed in respect of any one of them beyond the fire damage to it estimated according to the rule, although the value of the others may thereby be depreciated.

It may happen, and often does, that a fire occasions damage to the assured, no matter what the character of their interest, greatly in excess of the amount recoverable under a policy whereby the property burnt is insured up to its full insurable value. This is very apt to occur, and probably always does, when the property insured consists of the buildings and machinery of premises where a manufacturing business is carried on. A serious fire in such premises may wreck not only the property, but also a valuable business, to the utter ruin of the trader, and with serious consequences to his creditors also. In the case we have to deal with the business of the Messrs Hay appears to have been not merely paralysed and suspended for a season in consequence of the fire, but killed; at least we are told that although five years have since elapsed it has not been resumed, and that their manufacturing premises continue now in the state of wreck and ruin in which the fire left them. The Messrs Hay must of course suffer without indemnity this destruction of their business, and very possibly liability in damages for broken contracts which the fire, by destroying their buildings and plant, disabled them from fulfilling to an amount in excess of the value of the whole property. But the value of the property itself, including the site, may have been, and no doubt was, depreciated by this destruction of the business carried on there. It is not only an intelligible idea, but a familiar fact, that manufacturing premises, where a really or apparently extensive and

No. 176.
July 16, 1887.
Glasgow Pro-
vident Investment Society
v. Westminster Fire
Office.

thriving business is being carried on, will be valued even by money-lenders and their advisers at a larger sum than similar premises closed and unoccupied through the recent ruin (from whatever cause) of the trade that had been carried on there. I should think it not only probable, but certain (looking to the admission that has been so much relied on), that the Messrs Hay's property has been thus depreciated to a considerable extent beyond the fire damage covered by the policies. For if it was depreciated only to the amount of the fire damage it follows that if you add the value of that to the site and salvage you obtain the original value. The postponed creditor can indeed say, and does with some simplicity (as an argument), that the fire damage has not been paid to him. But the question I am now considering is, not to whom the fire damage ought to be paid, but what is the amount of it. Assume that the property is depreciated only by the fire damage, then if you value that and also value the site and salvage, the sum of the two values must give you the original value of the property. But if there is a further depreciation of the property from the wrecking of the business, so that it cannot profitably be resumed, and in fact is not, that further depreciation is not covered by a fire policy (in common form) any more than the destruction of or damage to the business whereby it is caused. What might be done by special insurance I have no occasion to consider.

It is clear, I think, from what I have said, that no property can be available insured against fire beyond its fee-simple value, and I should respectfully invite anyone who thinks otherwise to try to specify for what beyond this it can be insured. If you think of the various interests that can exist in any subject of property you will find that their value is limited by the fee-simple value of the property, and that any interest beyond it, if conceivable, must be nominal and worthless. No property can carry interests beyond its fee-simple value. The owner may transfer, divide, and share his interest in his property as he pleases, but he cannot multiply it or add to it. When the owner contracts debt and pledges the property to his creditor, a partition of interest is effected, the interest of the owner (as it previously existed) being diminished to the exact amount to which an interest is given to his creditor, the creditor taking all that the owner parted with (by giving it to him), but just as certainly taking no more. Whatever he confers on another, he himself parts with, so that adding what he parts with to what he retains, you have exactly the value of his original estate. Nor is the fact varied by speaking of what is retained and parted with as insurable interests. The insurable interest retained plus that parted with are together of the exact value of the original insurable interest as it existed entire in the owner before the partition. Of course the indebted owner does not necessarily part absolutely and for ever with the interest which he confers on his creditor, but he does part with it so long as the creditor lawfully retains it. The contingency of possible or probable return, in whole or in part, may be called "reversion" or "remainder." I have spoken in the singular, of a creditor, but the case will not be varied by speaking in the plural. Whether an indebted owner pledges his property to one creditor for £10,000, or to two creditors for £5000 each, the result must be the same. In either case the owner has parted with exactly the same amount of interest in his property, although in the former case there is one recipient, and in the latter two. The total of the retained and the transferred interests is the exact equivalent of the unity before partition, and indeed must be, unless there is some miraculous generation in the process of partition.

If these views are true—and I think they are elementary and indisputable—a fire office to which a common fire risk on property is proposed need have no concern with the debts upon it, or with the owner's pecuniary circumstances, and I should indeed be surprised to hear that a fire office required a search of incumbrances or troubled itself about the pecuniary circumstances of the owner of property proposed for insurance.

No. 176.

July 16, 1887.
Glasgow Pro-
vident Investment Society
v. Westminster
Fire
Office.

I have already said that I speak only of common fire policies on articles or subjects of property, and I may here notice that the exigencies of the case before us do not require the consideration of any insurable interests therein, except those of the owner and his creditors (one or more) to whom he has pledged it, that is, transferred his interest in it to a certain extent for a certain purpose. There may be others of which the case of The North British Insurance Company (5 Chan. Div. 569) affords a striking example. That case was cited to us in The Scottish Amicable Association v. Northern Assurance Company (11 R. 287), and is greatly relied on by the majority of the learned Judges in the present case. I did not think it in point in the case of the Scottish Amicable, and do not think it in point in this case, but as there is weighty opinion to the contrary, I must explain my views.

In that case goods, the property of a merchant, were in the custody of a wharfinger (at his wharf), under a contract whereby the wharfinger was bound to the owner to make good to him any loss or damage which the goods might sustain (by fire or otherwise) while in his keeping. The goods were fully insured against fire by the merchant in one office, and by the wharfinger in another. A fire occurred at the wharf and the goods were burned. There was no question as to the amount of the fire damage or the right of the merchant (the owner of the goods) to receive it. It was accordingly paid to him by arrangement between the insurance offices, who both acknowledged liability to him—the one directly and the other mediately through the wharfinger. The question before the Court was whether or not the wharfinger's insurer, who made the payment, was entitled to demand contribution from the merchant's insurer, and it was decided in the negative, on the ground that as the wharfinger's insurable interest was his contract liability to the owner, the payment to the owner by the wharfinger's insurer was equivalent to payment by the wharfinger himself in implement of his contract obligation, which, had he made it, would clearly have given him no claim for contribution from the owner's insurer. It was pointed out by the Master of the Rolls that had the merchant got payment from his insurer, as he might, he must have assigned his contract claim against the wharfinger, through which his insurer who had paid him would have recovered full relief from the insurer of the wharfinger. These views, if sound, and they were the grounds of the judgment, were of course conclusive against the claim for contribution there in question.

But although the decision in this Chancery case is not in point to the case before us, or to the case of The Scottish Amicable, I am far from thinking that it may not be usefully referred to. I think, on the contrary, that a right understanding and appreciation of it will serve to remove some erroneous views which seem to me to have influenced the opinion of a majority of the consulted Judges. There was in that case no question whatever as to the mode of estimating the fire damage to the property insured. It was estimated in the usual way, according to the rule which I have stated, and to the satisfaction of all concerned. Nor although the same property was fully insured in each of two offices, each of which received full premium, did the notion (extravagant as I

No. 176.

July 16, 1887.
Glasgow Provident Investment Society
v. Westminster Fire Office.

regard it) occur to anyone that double payment, or more than single payment, could be exacted. It was postulated that the wharfinger was under contract obligation (by his contract of custody as wharfinger) to make good to the merchant any damage to the goods while in his custody, including damage by fire, and that this contract obligation was not diminished or affected by the circumstance that the merchant held a policy on them from a fire office. If he fulfilled his contract obligation to the merchant by paying to him the fire damage, the merchant in that case sustained no damage by the fire to be made good under his policy, and it was and could be of no significance to either the merchant or his insurer where the wharfinger got the money with which he paid the amount due by him. If he did not fulfil the contract, the merchant, as the creditor in it, was bound to assign it to his own insurer on payment by him under the policy. On this assignation the merchant's insurer was clearly in a position to demand from the wharfinger, not a contribution, but full payment of his contract obligation, and if he held an unpaid policy in his own name on which he was in a position to demand what would enable him to meet his contract obligation, it was not doubtful, and at least the Court of Chancery so held, that recovery could be had under that policy by the merchant's insurer—not at all by way of contribution, but of total relief due by the insurer of the primary and ultimate obligant for the damage. This was of course absolutely inconsistent with the notion of contribution by the two insurers. There might, indeed, have been a double payment of the fire damage had the wharfinger contrived secretly to obtain payment from the insurer and embezzled the money, but in no other event that I can imagine.

I return to the case of burdened property insured by the owner for behoof of his creditor (or creditors), and of himself in reversion. And to make the case quite precise and definite, let us suppose that the debt is £9000, that this is as much as the property will carry, that it is all held by one creditor—say the Scottish Amicable Association—that this creditor has security therefor (indistinguishable in character from the security of the present pursuers, The Glasgow Investment Society), and that the insurance on the property, to the amount of £9000, is by a policy indistinguishable, except in names and sums, from that now sued on—the property being inventoried on the margin of the policy with a distinct sum insured on each article—the aggregate being £9000, and the insurance being to the Scottish Amicable Association and to the owners—(say the Messrs Hay)—in reversion. Let the policy be in any fire office you please,—say the Westminster. During the subsistence of this policy the fire of 1st August 1882 occurs, whereby damage is done to the property insured to the amount of £5668, estimated at what would suffice to repair it completely, including nine months' rent as the damage for the premises being incapable of occupation and so idle during the time ascertained to be necessary to make the repairs. On these assumed facts what sum would be recoverable from The Westminster Fire Office under the policy, and by whom? Or are these facts insufficient to enable you to judge of the amount? I assume that the facts are sufficient, that the amount recoverable would be £5668, and that it would be recoverable by The Scottish Amicable, leaving no reversion for the Messrs Hay. I do not argue the matter, this being exactly how The Scottish Amicable were dealt with in their action as creditors to the amount of £7485 and similarly insured. My suppositions really made no change beyond increasing the amount of their debt by £1515—property and security the same, fire and consequent damage the same, only the debt and insurance larger by £1515. Is it conceivable that this addition to the debt and sum insured would increase the fire damage to the property insured, or the claim of the assured? If anyone can conceive it, I should like to be favoured with his estimate of the amount of increase, and his distribution of it over the several items in the schedule or inventory of the damaged property.

No. 176.

July 16, 1887.

Glasgow Provident Investment Society v. Westminster Fire Office.

But taking the articles of property to be exactly as they in fact were, and the fire damage to each to be exactly as it was ascertained to be, giving a total of £5668, it is obviously impossible that more than this would have been recovered under an insurance for £9000 (adding together the sums insured on the several items) to a creditor in a debt of £9000, and to the owner in reversion, unless the insurance covered something ultra the fire damage to the property. What is that something ultra supposed to be? Nothing ultra is specified in the policy. What is there besides the fire damage to those specified items to be taken account of? The answer, as I collect it from the opinions of the majority of the consulted Judges, is, depreciation of the creditor's security considered as existing over the whole property regarded as a composite subject, and consisting of site, buildings, and machinery, so that after crediting the sum of £5668 paid as the fire damage to the property specified in the policy, the site and salvage after the fire does not afford as good security for the balance of his debt as the whole property before the fire did for the whole debt.

The objections to this certainly novel idea are I think insuperable. At present, however, I desire only to point out that if it will hold good in the case of a postponed creditor (among any number of creditors you please to think of), it must equally hold good in the case of one creditor who holds the whole debt on the property. Taking the whole debt at £9000, and supposing it to be held by one creditor who accordingly receives £5668 as the whole fire damage, his position is that of an unpaid creditor for the balance of £3332 with the depreciated security of site and salvage which is assumed not to be as good security or it as the entire property was for £9000. His case is indistinguishable from that of a postponed creditor for that amount, or any less amount, on the assumption on which the notion is based, that the security therefor has been depreciated by the fire.

It must of course also hold good in the case of a preferable creditor, and there is indeed something paradoxical if not absurd in the notion that a postponed creditor can be in a better position than a preferable creditor. But why, then, did the Scottish Amicable under their insurance for £7485 receive only £5668? Their debt was thus left unpaid to the amount of £1817, with the depreciated security of site and salvage. It is, indeed, true that they made no claim in respect of depreciation of security ultra the fire damage to the several items of property insured—I should have thought for the sufficient reason that their policies covered nothing ultra. But then neither does this Glasgow Investment Society make any claim for such depreciation of security. Their policy is in the same terms as the policies to the Scottish Amicable, and their claim is made on the same footing exactly. This novel idea of a claim for depreciation of composite subjects had not been thought of when the case of The Scottish Amicable was decided, or even when the record in the present action was closed.

I have, I hope, made it clear that taking the debt at any amount you please, the number of creditors who hold it cannot affect the estimate of fire damage payable on a common fire policy to the creditors and their debtor (the owner) in reversion. Nor can the number of policies by which or of fire offices in which the insurance is effected signify. I assume that no concealment or trickery is intended, or indeed could be successfully practised by going to several offices, and that the only purpose in doing so is distribution of business or greater security. The insurable interests of creditors (one or more) cannot be increased or diminished according as they are insured in one office, or in more than one, and plainly the damage to the same property by the same fire and the consequent suffering of the assured must be quite independent of the number of policies or offices. I may here again point out that the insurances to the Scottish Amicable (and their debtor in reversion) for £7485 were by four policies in four offices, which were all, I think, most properly regarded and dealt with as one. If property will fairly carry £9000 of debt, and is fairly insurable to that amount, it cannot affect the estimate of fire damage, or the amount recoverable by fire insurance, whether the debt was contracted and the insurance effected all at once or piecemeal. If the whole debt is held by one creditor he must necessarily suffer the whole damage which the fire could possibly do to any number of creditors among whom it might be divided, and his suffering will be the same whether he lent £9000 at once and in one sum, or on two occasions in sums of say £8100 on the first and £900 on the second, and whether he holds one policy for £9000 or two policies for £8100 and £900 respectively. Again, if you assume, say two policies, one for £8100 and the other for £900 over the same property and in the same terms, but in different offices, to say that the sums recoverable under them in respect of the same fire will be different according as they are both to the same money lender or each of them to a different money lender (in conjunction with the debtor), appears to me to be almost, or I should say quite, irrational. The damage to property by a given fire, and recoverable under a common fire policy, must be independent of the amount of debt on it or the number of creditors by whom it is held, and it must indeed be startling to fire offices to hear that their risk and liability under policies is or may be increased or diminished according to the indebtedness of the owner of the property insured, and that they are concerned to inquire into the position of anyone to whom they are directed by the policy to pay primo loco what may become due under it—to inquire whether he is a creditor, as to the amount and validity of his debt and security, and whether he is a preferable or postponed creditor—and the “composite subject” over which his security extends their liability under the policy depending on these facts. I think this will be news to the oldest and most experienced fire offices in the kingdom, although what they are to make of the news when it breaks upon them, and they try to realise it and find out what exactly it practically means, I have myself no conception, beyond this, that something to be ascertained somehow in excess of the fire damage to the property insured will have to be paid preferably to postponed creditors in case they should otherwise be left without indemnity by the fact, which has heretofore been regarded as common and familiar enough, that the whole fire damage has been properly claimed by and paid to preferable creditors.

No. 176.

July 16, 1887.
Glasgow Provident Investment Society v. Westminster Fire Office.

It is, I assume, certain that the position of the Glasgow Investment Society, as creditors of the Messrs Hay in a debt of £900, with a security therefor over their mill and machinery, has been prejudiced or worsened by the fire of 1st August 1882, although I should myself find it impossible to estimate the extent and bring it within this action, and am not surprised that my learned brethren shrank from the task. The general view which my learned brethren find resistible seems to be that this society, holding a fire policy over the property, No. 176. he burning of which worsened their position as creditors holding a security for July 16, 1887. left upon it, as part of a "composite subject," they must have something out of Glasgow Pro- he policy, and that this something must be estimated at what will indemnify vident Invest- ment Society hem for their suffering—indemnity being the great leading and governing v. Westmin- principle of the law of insurance. But indemnity, according to the law of in- ster Fire Office. urance, must be paid with money, which the same law of insurance produces, nd I have indeed laboured in vain if I have not shewn that the law of insurance will produce no money out of a fire policy on property beyond the damage done o the property by fire, estimated by the rule of what will completely restore or epair it. If that will indemnify those who have suffered—whose position has een prejudiced or worsened—by the fire, it is indeed well. If not, there must f necessity be a residue of suffering without indemnity. I need hardly repeat hat I do not refer to insurances of special risks and interests (which may con- eivably be infinitely various, although I do not happen to have met with an stance of any such) distinctly proposed and accepted, and therefore specified nd paid for.

It seems to be thought too dreadful to be contemplated with equanimity that he Glasgow Investment Society, though sufferers by the fire, should take nothing by the policy sued on, and that the Westminster Fire Office, which eceived a premium, should pay nothing. But I have to point out, first, that lthough according to my view of the law the Investment Society take nothing y this policy, i.e., nothing which, as it happens, they would not have taken ad it not existed—they do take as much as creditors in their position can ossibly take by fire insurance, viz., the extinction of preferable debts to the ull amount of the fire damage: and second, that it is not according to my opinion that the Westminster shall escape without payment, inasmuch as I think hey are right in the view which they take and avow of their position, viz., that hey are liable to contribute proportionally to the payment of the fire damage y the payment of which the assured with them have benefited. It will not, I hink, be disputed that all the bondholding creditors of an insured owner will, ven without being named in his policy, take preferably to him all that may ecome due under it, and that (named in the policy or not) their rights inter se will be governed by the priority of their securities. I do not know whether his result is admitted in what may be regarded as the typical case, viz., that of he owner and his creditors being all insured together in one policy to the full eaurable value of the property and their interests; but it seems to me so clear hat I venture to assume it. In such a case let me assume that there is one reditor (or two creditors, the number is immaterial) prior and preferable to the others, and that the fire damage does not exceed his debt. Is it thought doubt- ful that he will take the whole of it to the exclusion of the others? And if he does, as he certainly will, is it true that the others—that is to say, the postponed creditors—take nothing by the policy? I should say that they take all that postponed creditors can take by insurance when the money value of the fire damage is exhausted by the claims of preferable creditors, viz., clearing the pro- perty of the preferable debts to that amount, the whole benefit of the clearance going to them. How does the principle of indemnity entitle them to more, unless, indeed, they are to be indemnified for more than the depreciation of their security by the damage covered by the policy? It may indeed, as I have shewn, be depreciated in excess of this damage (as by stoppage and destruction of busi-

No. 176.

July 16, 1887.
Glasgow Pro-
vident Investment Society
v. Westminster Fire
Office.

ness, whereby undoubtedly the property value of business premises may be depreciated), but that excess is not covered by the policy. The depreciation so covered is measured by the fire damage to the property, and if prior and preferable securities are reduced to that exact amount, the postponed creditors are fully indemnified so far as insurance law permits under a common fire policy on property. If they are to have more, a fund must be found out of which they are to get it—a fund consisting of money ultra or in excess of the fire damage to the property insured, and which they are to have as compensation for the depreciation of the property ultra or in excess of the fire damage to it. This is perplexing, and I must, with great respect to others who think differently, say extravagant.

I have dealt with the case of one policy whereby all (owner and creditors) are fully insured up to the insurable value of the property, and whereby the whole insurable interest of each insurer is comprehended. I must refer to what I have already said to shew that the rights and liabilities, hinc inde, of assured and insurers cannot be affected by the number of policies whereby the same property is insured in the same terms to the same amount, and to the same parties having the same insurable interests. It would be scandalous and a reproach to the law if it were true that while an insurance on property to its full value, for behoof of the owner and his creditors, will produce only the actual fire damage to the property if effected by one policy in one fire office, it will produce more if effected by two policies in two offices. And how, I should like to know, are you to measure the excess of productive power by this contrivance? You begin with the fire damage to the property, if you have one policy covering all interests up to the value of the property. If you are to increase this as you multiply policies with individual creditors named along with the owner in each, what is the rule for the increase?

I am aware that the learned Judges from whom I differ think that the Westminster Fire Office is not liable as a contributory for the fire damage paid to The Scottish Amicable, although the assured with them benefited, as I have shewn, by that payment. But have they not overlooked the circumstance that this office incurred the risk of having to pay the whole £900 insured by their policy? Had the fire damage exceeded, as it might, the sums insured to the Scottish Amicable, the Westminster would have been liable for the excess up to the £900 insured by them, of course within the limits which I have already specified, viz., 1st, the damage to the property specified in their policy, and 2d, the damage to the interest of those assured by them, which (the owner being assured) must have equalled the first. Their position with respect to liability is obviously the same as it would have been had their policy been to The Scottish Amicable and the Messrs Hay in reversion. In that case the amount of fire damage being what it was, the Westminster would simply have contributed with the other four offices to meet it, and would no doubt have been sued in the same action with these four offices. By the Westminster policy, taking it as it is, the insurance on the property (that is, the property specified in it) was increased by £900, and the fire and consequent damage might have been (although it happened not to be) extensive enough to require payment by them of the whole amount. In that case the five policies, producing enough to pay both the preferable and postponed creditors, the Glasgow Investment Society would have received this £900 as their share.

By the policy sued on fourteen distinct items are insured each for a specified sum, the total being £900. Eight of these only (including three items of rent) are alleged to have been damaged by fire, and the pursuers' claim is therefore limited to them. We can take account of no others. The claim is distinctly stated in cond. 4, and the result of it is that the claim in respect of each item is the full sum insured on it, the total being £565, which accordingly is the sum sued for.

No. 176.
July 16, 1887.
Glasgow Provident Investment Society v. Westminster Fire Office.

It follows from what I have stated that if these items, or any of them, were damaged by the fire of 1st August 1882, beyond the amount insured on them respectively to the admittedly preferable creditors (The Scottish Amicable), such excess would, in my opinion, be recoverable under this policy. But with the exception of one item (of £5, which has been admitted and paid), it is conceded that the whole were individually insured to the preferable creditors to an amount exceeding the fire damage to them, singly and in the aggregate, the whole of which has accordingly been properly paid to the preferable creditors.

It will suffice to take one item, and I take the first and largest—the “barley-mill and counting-house”—which was insured by seven policies to the aggregate amount of £2390. By the fire it was admittedly damaged to the amount of £1610 exactly, so that the insurance was, as it happened, superfluous to the extent of £780. The insurance on this building to the prior creditor being in excess of the damage (it was so by £590), the whole was paid to the prior creditor. Was this proper and in accordance with the prior creditor's right? It admittedly was so. The prior creditor was not necessarily, and probably not in fact, indemnified in the popular sense by this payment, but it was all the indemnity he could get, although his insurance was for £590 more. It was, I think, suggested that he might have rebuilt or repaired the mill, but he certainly could not. He had an absolute right to the money, but none to rebuild or repair his debtor's mill, which might, and probably would, have been a foolish and ruinous proceeding for both. I am myself of opinion that the insurers by all the seven policies were and are liable to contribute proportionally this sum of £1610, and they are themselves quite agreed that they are. I think it clear that all the parties assured by these seven policies take benefit by the payment in exact proportion to the value of their respective insurable interests. The prior creditor gets his debt paid to that amount; the postponed creditors get the preferable security discharged to that amount; and the owner gets his debt paid and his property unburdened to the same amount. I do not doubt that this is exactly what was intended by all the parties, whether insurers or assured, and am not impressed by the view, which I think fanciful, that “it is just because a postponed creditor will take no benefit from the insurances of prior creditors except in one event (reinstatement), which may or may not happen, and which he has no power to bring about, that he takes the precaution of insuring separately for himself.” If “a postponed creditor” wishes to insure for himself in such terms, that if the insurers do not exercise their option to reinstate, but elect to pay the whole fire damage to the preferable creditors, he shall be dealt with, not merely as if he were one of them, which would only give him a pari passu share with the others, but as if he were the sole creditor, and as such entitled to the fire damage up to the amount of his insurance, I should require him to specify his meaning in his proposal, and should be surprised if any fire office accepted it.

I have taken this item of the barley-mill and counting-house as a specimen. The other items specified in cond. 4 (laying aside the three for rent) are similar, and subject to the same observations.

No. 176.

July 16, 1887.
Glasgow Pro-
vident Investment Society
v. Westminster Fire
Office.

The majority of the learned Judges seem to think that the Investment Society's security, or the property over which it existed, is the subject insured by the policy, and that the question is, what loss they have suffered "by the damage done by fire to the subject of their security." And by "the subject of their security" I understand the learned Judges to mean the property specified in their bond to be ascertained by an inspection of it. They say,—“The subject of the insurance was the property—the particular building and machinery specified in the policy were all parts of the property, the machinery having been built into or permanently attached to the ground, and the value of the security depended on the unity of the subject—site, buildings, and machinery. The insurance was one over a composite subject, the sum insured being allocated over the particular buildings and machinery enumerated in the policy, and the injury to these by the fire, inasmuch as it not only destroyed the particular buildings and machinery, but greatly depreciated the composite subject, destroyed also the security for the protection of which the insurance was effected.”

I must, with all due respect, say that in my opinion all this is erroneous. I doubt if a creditor ever submitted a proposal for such an insurance as is here imagined (for it is quite imaginary), and I more than doubt if any fire office would accept such a proposal. It would involve a very special risk indeed, viz., of liability not only for the damage by fire to the property specified and insured, but for the consequential depreciation of a “composite subject” outside and beyond it, and not specified at all. If you are not to travel outside and beyond the specified and insured property, but confine your inquiry to the damage to it by the fire, it is obviously idle to refer to any other; and if you are to go beyond and inquire about other property, it must be with a view to extend the insurer's liability to the depreciation of property not insured by them, and which may very possibly (though this is immaterial) be the subject of insurance by other policies.

I must further respectfully observe that the insurance in question is not an insurance of the value of the Investment Society's security, but simply of (I quote from the policy) “the property described in the margin hereof” for the sums set opposite the respective items. The insurance office had no concern at all with any other property, and even with respect to that specified were not concerned to inquire (and probably did not) whether there was debt on it or not.

Nor are we in this action concerned with all the property described in the policy, but only with the eight items of it specified in cond. 4. Three of these are for rent (one of them paid), and so there are only five items of property, the insurance of which and the damage to which we have any occasion to inquire about, and with respect to them I venture to think that the case is simple and easily soluble on familiar principles of insurance law and familiar rules governing the relations of debtor and creditor and of creditors inter se.

What was the position of the owners (the Hays) with respect to these articles of property when they granted security over them to the Glasgow Investment Society? They had previously pledged them by a valid and subsisting preferable security to the Scottish Amicable Association, and insured them to that Association to the amount of £2575. What interest in them remained to themselves either to retain or bestow on the Glasgow Investment Society; or, if you please to put it so, what insurable interest remained to them in these five articles of property to retain or bestow? The answer is plain—the residue or reversion (if any) after satisfying the preferable claim of The Scottish Amicable. This (or something within it) they bestowed on the Glasgow Investment Society, who accordingly, having no other author, can have nothing more. The Messrs Hay had no more to give, and the Investment Society certainly knew it. What in these circumstances was the purpose of the policy with the Westminster, which is for £430 over those five items, which were already insured for £2575. The only legitimate purpose, and therefore I assume the true purpose, was to cover a reasonably estimated excess of insurable value beyond £2575. In that view it was a prudent measure, and had the fire damage exceeded £2575, the excess up to £430 would all have been payable under this policy, by which alone it was covered. It in fact amounted to exactly £1654, 10s., and so the insurance with the Westminster turned out to be a superfluous precaution, just as the insurances by the policies to the Scottish Amicable were, as it happened, superfluous to the amount of £921, 10s. In other words, the fire damage to those five items fall short of the sums insured on them by £1351. Now, take their full market value on the eve of the fire at any sum you please, that value was reduced or depreciated by the fire (for I take no account of depreciation from any other cause) to the extent of £1654, 10s., the property so depreciated being left extant for whom it may concern, according to their legal rights in it. The property as it stood on the eve of the fire was of higher market value by £1654, 10s. exactly than the same property as it stood after the fire. That this is true is certain on the assumption that the damage to it by fire was rightly estimated, which is admitted. It follows that the Investment Society have sustained no damage by the fire. The residuary value, after satisfying the claims of the Scottish Amicable, is so far from being reached, that their preferable claim upon the property remains outstanding to a considerable amount. And as I have already pointed out, the depreciation of the property by the fire damage, and the reduction of the preferable security by the payment to the prior creditor, are exactly commensurate.

I hesitate to consume time by referring to the rent items, the insurance of which, according to established rule, and an express note on the policy before us, covers only "the payment of rent for such portion of the said term of one year as the foresaid buildings respectively may be actually untenanted in consequence of fire." This in the case of the "barley-mill and counting-house" was found to be nine months, and the Scottish Amicable were accordingly allowed the full rent of this building for that period, viz., £350. How is the Glasgow Investment Society to have £120 in addition? Is it because the untenanted condition of this building for nine months has "depreciated the composite subject" to that exact amount? I ought not perhaps to wonder if the answer is in the affirmative, for a great majority of the learned Judges to whom we appealed for aid have informed us distinctly that in their opinion depreciation of composite subject is relevant and fitting to be considered in deciding upon the pursuers' claim as specified in cond. 4, being the only claim before us, which seems to imply that we may and ought in respect of it to allow something upon each or some of the eight items of claim, and why not £120 upon the claim for rent of barley-mill and counting-house? This is no doubt as sensible as it is, on the same consideration of depreciation of composite subject, to allow £80 on a steam-boiler house which was admittedly not damaged at all, the fire not having reached it, or a like sum of £80 on a steam-boiler and connections which was admittedly damaged only to the extent of £15. It seems to me, although with such a weight of authority against me I speak with much diffidence, that

No. 176.

July 16, 1887.
Glasgow Provident Investment Society v. Westminster Fire Office.

No. 176. it is idle to speak of depreciation of "composite subject" unless you can somehow make it yield a definite sum of money, which can be judicially awarded to the pursuers under some or all of the eight heads of their claim. I have found it impossible without any materials whatever, and there certainly are none, to fix upon a sum as the depreciation of "composite subject," and if I try provisionally to surmount this preliminary difficulty by pitching upon any sum within the amount covered by the policy, I am utterly unable to divide it into parts to be awarded under all or any of the heads which I find in cond. 4—"The subjects and others undernamed were damaged by the said fire to the extent after mentioned, being the amount to which they were respectively insured." I cannot find room for depreciation of "composite subject," although with the opinion which I have that the idea is futile, I may very likely exaggerate the difficulties attending the practical application of it.

July 16, 1887.
Glasgow Provident Investment Society v. Westminster Fire Office.

After what I have said it is perhaps unnecessary to add that I altogether dissent from the views of the majority of the Judges to the effect that the insurers here will, on making payment to the Investment Society, be entitled "as an incident of the contract of indemnity" to demand an assignation of their debt against the Messrs Hay. They say—"This is the case explained by Lord J. Mellish in the North British Insurance Company, 5 Chan. Div. 583, in a passage of his opinion which appears to have been misunderstood." I have already noticed this case at some length, and it will be seen from what I have said that I also think it has been misunderstood. I think I understand that case, and also the case of Simon v. Thomson, 3 App. Ca. 279, and if I do they have no bearing on this.

According to the import and exigency of the policy, in my opinion, the insurer's liability is the same exactly whether the demand is made by the Investment Society or by the Messrs Hay. So that the former can demand no more in the first instance on their right to take primo loco than the latter would be entitled to receive if the right of the former were cancelled.

My opinion is that the whole fire damage to the property insured by the policy sued on having been properly paid to the Scottish Amicable Association, who had right thereto preferably to the pursuers, the pursuers have no right to recover anything in respect of that damage, for which they have been indemnified by the extinction, to the amount of it, of the preferable debt. I think no account can be taken in this action of any damage except damage by fire to the property specified in cond. 4 of the record, and in particular that no account can be taken of depreciation of the composite subject of the Glasgow Investment Society's security.

LORD CRAIGHILL.—I concur in the opinion delivered by your Lordship, and refer to it and to the opinions of the majority of the consulted Judges for the reasons for which, I think, the judgment proposed by your Lordship ought to be pronounced.

LORD RUTHERFURD CLARK.—I wish to give a short explanation with reference to my judgment in the former case. I concurred in the decision that was pronounced, and am glad to see that that decision has not been impeached. Indeed it was not disputed then, nor is it disputed now, that the pursuers were entitled to prevail. Nothing more was maintained than this,—(first) that the postponed bondholders should be called as parties; and (second) that the sum representing the amount of the loss should be brought into Court by the whole insuring companies in order that it might be distributed in a multiplepinding. I did not think that it was necessary to call persons who were admittedly postponed bondholders, and whose claims were admittedly postponed to the claims of the prior bondholders. Nor did I think that the question of right should be tried in a multiplepinding raised by all the companies. For it appeared to me that this would put the prior bondholders to a disadvantage, inasmuch as it was, to say the least, doubtful whether they could claim the whole fund, seeing that it was to be contributed in part by companies with whom they had no contract. But be that as it may, it is very satisfactory to know that in this case it has not been maintained that our decision was wrong, or that the prior bondholders were not entitled to the sum for which they obtained decree.

In this case I agree with the minority of the consulted Judges and Lord Young.

The defenders stated that they did not desire an assignation.

THE COURT pronounced the following interlocutor:—"The Lords of the Second Division of the Court, along with and in presence of all the other Judges of the Court, having considered the minutes of debate for the parties and heard counsel thereon and on the whole cause, Find, in conformity with the opinions of the majority of the consulted Judges, that the defenders, the Westminster Fire Insurance Office, are bound under the policy of insurance libelled to pay to the pursuers, the Glasgow Provident Investment Company, the amount of loss sustained by the said pursuers by reason of the fire in the premises of the Messrs Hay founded on in the record: Find that the amount of such loss is £350: Find that the Messrs Hay are not entitled in respect of their consent and concurrence in this action to any separate or individual decree in their favour: Ordain the said defenders to make payment to the pursuers of the said sum of £350, with interest thereon from 31st August 1882 till paid: With these alterations, adhere to the interlocutor of the Lord Ordinary of 10th November 1885, and refuse the reclaiming note for the said defenders: Find the pursuer entitled to additional expenses; remit to the Auditor to tax the same, and to report, and decern."

SMITH & MASON, S.S.C.—H. B. & F. J. DEWAR, W.S.—Agents.

STEPHEN YOUTEN (Clerk to the Leven Police Commissioners), Pursuer (Respondent).—Gloag—W. Campbell.

THOMAS JACKSON, Defender (Appellant).—Rhind—Hay.

No. 177.

July 16, 1887.
Youden v.
Jackson.

Road—Private Street—Notice—General Police and Improvement (Scotland) Act, 1862 (25 and 26 Vict. cap. 101), secs. 150, 151, 394, and 397.—Section 150 of the General Police and Improvement Act, 1862, enacts with reference to private streets that "it shall be lawful for the Police Commissioners to cause any such street or part of a street . . . to be properly levelled, paved, or causewayed and flagged." Sec. 151 authorises the Commissioners to recover the cost from the proprietors of property fronting or abutting on the street, by private improvement assessment. Section 397 enacts, that the Commissioners shall "give notice of their intention to do or perform, or to authorise to be done or performed, such matter or thing either by public advertisement in some newspaper circulating in the burgh or in the county in which the burgh is situated, or by posting handbills in conspicuous places in the burgh, or by notice in writing to be transmitted through the post-office, or delivered personally, or at their

No. 177. dwelling-houses, to the individuals having interest, as the Commissioners shall think proper; and it shall be lawful for any person whose property shall be taken or affected, and who shall consider himself injured or aggrieved in respect of such other matters and things by this Act so directed to be done or performed and provided for, to appeal to the Sheriff from any order made or notice given by the Commissioners in respect of such matters or things," &c. The Act provides no special form for such notices.

July 16, 1887.
Youden v.
Jackson.

The Commissioners of a burgh put up a notice at the market cross, and at each end of a road which had long been used as a public road, intimating the intention of the Commissioners "to fix the level" of the road, "to make the roadway thereof, and a footpath on both sides, with kerb and gutters," but the notice did not state that the road was to be dealt with as a private street, and did not shew that the Commissioners intended to hold the owners of property fronting or abutting on the road liable for the cost.

In an action brought by the Commissioners against the owner of property abutting on the street for payment of a proportion of the cost, the defender pleaded (1) that the road was not a private street, and (2) that if it were a private street the Commissioners had not given sufficient notice under sec. 397.

The Court, after a proof, held (1) that the road was a private street, and (2) that the notice was sufficient.

2d Division.
Sheriff of Fifeshire.

L.

In June 1880 the Police Commissioners of the Burgh of Leven, which had in 1867 adopted the General Police and Improvement (Scotland) Act, 1862, posted up at three places within the burgh notices in the following terms:—

"NOTICE IS HEREBY GIVEN

"That the Leven Police Commissioners, acting under 25 and 26 Vict. cap. 101, intend to fix the level of the road leading from Scoonie Place westwards by Blackwood Place to the Waggon Road, to make the roadway thereof, and a footpath on both sides, with kerb and gutter.

"Plan of the said intended works may be seen by all persons interested therein at the office of the Commissioners, Bank Street, Leven.

"Notice is hereby further given, that the Commissioners will meet in the Town Hall, Leven, on Thursday, the 1st day of July next, at ten o'clock A.M., when all persons so interested may be heard thereupon.

"S. YODEN,

"Clerk to the Commissioners.

"Leven, 2d June 1880."

The works of which notice was thus given were carried out, and the Commissioners assessed the cost on the owners of the properties fronting the street, on the footing that it was a private street, and consequently that these owners were liable under sections 150 and 151 of the General Police and Improvement Act, 1862.* Thomas Jackson, solicitor, Kirk-

* The following were the sections of the General Police and Improvement (Scotland) Act, 1862 (25 and 26 Vict. cap. 101), referred to:—

Sec. 150.—"Whereas it would conduce to the convenience of the inhabitants, and be for the public advantage, if provision were made for the levelling, paving, or causewaying, and flagging of streets which have been laid out and formed by persons who have neglected to have the same properly levelled, paved, or causewayed and flagged, and for preventing such inconveniences in future: Be it therefore enacted that where any private street or part of a street is at the adoption of this Act formed or laid out, or shall at any time thereafter be formed or laid out, and is not, together with the footways thereof, sufficiently levelled, paved, or causewayed, and flagged to the satisfaction of the Commissioners, it shall be lawful for the Commissioners to cause any such street, or part of a street, and the footways thereof, to be freed from obstructions, and to be properly levelled, paved, or causewayed, and flagged and channelled in such way, and with such materials as to them shall seem most expedient; and no such caldy, one of these owners, declined to pay the sum of £22, 6s. 3d., being his proportion of the total cost, and an action was accordingly raised against him in the Sheriff Court at Kirkcaldy, at the instance of the clerk to the Commissioners, for that sum.

No. 177.

July 16, 1887.

Youden v.

Jackson.

The questions raised sufficiently appear from Jackson's grounds of defence, which were (1) that the road in question was a public not a private street; (2) that even if it was a private street, the Commissioners had treated it as a public street by giving notice in the above terms, which, as the defender maintained, were those required by section 394 of the Police Act, 1882, the section relating to public streets, and not those of a notice under section 397—that dealing with private streets; (3) that in any case the notices had not been posted up "in conspicuous places as required by the Act." Of these grounds of defence it is necessary to consider the second alone here.

On 10th December 1886, the Sheriff-substitute (Gillespie), after a proof bearing on the first and third grounds of defence, pronounced this interlocutor:—"Finds in fact that, at the date of the adoption of the 'General Police and Improvement (Scotland) Act, 1862,' in Leven, and also at the date of the proceedings of the Police Commissioners of Leven, set forth in the fourth article of the pursuer's condescendence, the road in question was a private street within the meaning of the Act, which was not, with the footways thereof, sufficiently levelled, paved, or causewayed, street shall be considered to have been sufficiently paved or causewayed and flagged unless the same shall be completed with kerbstones and gutters to the satisfaction of the Commissioners."

Sec. 151.—"The whole of the costs, charges, and expenses incurred by the Commissioners in respect of private streets shall be paid and reimbursed to them by the owners of lands or premises fronting or abutting on each street" proportionately to the frontages of their respective premises.

Sec. 394.—"Twenty-eight days at the least before fixing the level of any street which has not been theretofore levelled or paved, and before making any sewer where none was before, or altering the course or level of or abandoning or stopping any sewer, the Commissioners shall give notice of their intention by posting a printed or written notice in a conspicuous place at each end of every such street through or in which such work is to be undertaken, which notice shall set forth the name or situation of the street intended to be levelled or paved, and the names of the places through or near which it is intended that the new sewer shall pass, or the existing sewer be altered or stopped up, and also the places of the beginning and the end thereof, and shall refer to the plans of such intended work, and shall specify a place where such plans may be seen, and a time and place where all persons interested in such intended work may be heard thereupon."

Sec. 397.—"And in respect to appeal as to all other matters and things which the Commissioners are by the police provisions of this Act empowered to do or perform, or to authorise to be done or performed, and the cost attending which falls by this Act to be provided for by way of private improvement assessment, the Commissioners shall, when not otherwise hereby directed, give notice of their intention to do or perform, or to authorise to be done or performed such matter or thing, either by public advertisement in some newspaper circulating in the burgh or in the county in which the burgh is situated, or by posting hand-bills in conspicuous places in the burgh, or by notice in writing to be transmitted through the post-office or delivered personally, or at their dwelling-houses, to the individuals having interest, as the Commissioners shall think proper; and it shall be lawful for any person whose property shall be taken or affected, and who shall consider himself injured or aggrieved in respect of such other matters and things by this Act so directed to be done or performed and provided for, to appeal to the Sheriff from any order made or notice given by the Commissioners in respect of such matters or things," &c.

No. 177. and flagged to the satisfaction of the Police Commissioners ; but finds, in law, that the notice which the Police Commissioners gave of their intention, of which notice No. 58 of process is a copy, was not a sufficient notice of their intention to deal with the road as a private street; assolizes the defender.”

July 16, 1887.
Youden v.
Jackson.

On appeal, the Sheriff (Mackay) ordered additional proof (from which it appeared, inter alia, that the notices had been posted up, one at each end of the street in question, and the third on the door of a coal-cellar which was on or near the site of the old burgh cross, and was regarded as its equivalent), and thereafter pronounced an interlocutor finding in fact that, at the date of the Commissioners' proceedings, the street was a private street, that it was not at that date, together with the footways thereof, sufficiently levelled, paved, or causewayed, and flagged to the satisfaction of the Commissioners. “(3) That notice was given by the Commissioners, by posting handbills in the burgh of Leven, of the operations intended to be performed on the said street, which consisted in paving the roadway thereof, and a footway on both sides, with kerbs and gutters, and (4) that such operations were duly performed by them: Finds in law—(1) That these operations were of a kind which the Commissioners, under the said Act, were entitled to perform on a private street, and to assess for as private improvement assessment, under sections 397 and 150 of the said Act; (2) that the notice given of the Commissioners' intention to perform these operations was sufficient notice under the said Act, and was sufficiently published by posting handbills in conspicuous places in the burgh, one of the modes of notice authorised by section 397 of the said Act: Therefore grants decree in favour of the pursuer, in terms of the conclusions of the petition,” with modified expenses.

The defender appealed, and argued (on the second question);—*Campbell v. Leith Police Commissioners*¹ settled that the notice to be given in relation to a private street must be a notice under the 397th section of the Police Act 1862, and that a notice under the 394th section was ineffectual for that purpose. Here the notice was in every particular except one a notice in the form provided by the 394th section. It did not bear to relate to a private street, and in this respect the case was a fortiori of Campbell's case, where the notice which was rejected as being under the 394th section did so bear; it was posted up at each end of the street affected; it referred to a plan of the intended works, specifying a place where the plan might be seen; and it fixed a meeting for hearing persons interested at a date which was twenty days after the date of the notice, and lastly, and most important, the leading work of which notice was given was “fixing the level of the road,” which was an operation contemplated by the 394th section only. No one reading the notice, therefore, would have the least reason to suspect that it was intended as a notice under the 397th section, for although the operations of “making the roadway and a footpath on both sides, with kerb and gutter,” were not operations contemplated by that section, and were operations contemplated by the 397th section, their insertion in a notice intended to be under section 397 would not invalidate such a notice, and was, indeed, quite a natural and proper intimation to make of what the Commissioners proposed in fact to do.

Argued for the pursuer (on the second point);—It was a mistake to suppose that Campbell's case decided that a notice in terms similar to the present was a notice under the 394th section, and not under the 397th. That was indeed conceded throughout the whole course of the case, but on what grounds did not appear. The notice itself was nowhere to be found, either in any of the reports or in the session papers, at least it was nowhere fully printed, if the statement by the Lord Ordinary¹ (Lord Ormisdale)—that it bore to be under the 394th section—was accurate in point of fact, but this statement was in no way corroborated. The question, therefore, whether the present notice was to be taken as under the 397th section or under the 394th was not foreclosed by Campbell's case, and treating the matter as an open one the notice was fairly to be taken under the 397th section. The steps of procedure pointed out by the notice were no doubt similar to those required by the 397th section, but then the 394th section enjoined no special form of notice or procedure, and it was therefore both natural and proper that the analogy of the 394th section should be followed in these matters. The only difficulty arose from the use of the words "fix the level" instead of "level," but that was too slender a ground on which to invalidate the notice as a notice under the 397th section, especially as there was as a set-off an intimation of the Commissioners' intention to make the roadway and a footpath, with kerb and gutter—which operations the 397th section alone contemplated.

¹ Campbell v. Leith Police Commissioners, June 21, 1866, 4 Macph. 853, 38 Scot. Jur. 445, rev. Feb. 28, 1870, 8 Macph. (H. L.) 31, 42 Scot. Jur. 310, L. R., Scot. & Div. App. 1.

At advising,—

LORD CRAIGHILL.—(After dealing with the other questions, and coming to the same conclusions on them as the Sheriff)—The next question is whether or not the notice which was given was such as was required by the statute. The terms of the notice and the terms of the 397th section of the statute under which, as the pursuer says, the notice was given, are quoted in the Sheriff's note. There is no form of notice prescribed in the 397th section. All that is enjoined is that the Commissioners shall give notice of their intention to do or to perform, and authorise to be done or performed, such matter or thing in one of the ways specified. Now, what was intimated was that the Commissioners "intend to fix the level of the road leading from Scoonie Place westwards by Blackwood Place to the Waggon-Road, to make the roadway thereof and a footpath on both sides, with kerb and gutter." These are within the works which are authorised by section 150, and therefore it appears to me, as it did to the Sheriff, that the notice was all that was necessary. The defender says that the notice, such as it was, is as applicable to operations on a public street as to operations on a private street; but on a comparison of the provisions of section 394 with those of section 150 it will be found that a part of the work of which intimation was given occur in and are authorised by sec. 150 only, which relates to private streets. I concur in the conclusion at which the Sheriff has arrived.

LORD YOUNG, LORD RUTHERFURD CLARK, and the LORD JUSTICE-CLERK concurred.

THE COURT pronounced the following interlocutor:—"Find in fact (1) that the piece of ground now called Blackwood Place was at the date of the proceedings set forth in the 4th article of the condescendence for the pursuer a private road within the meaning of the General Police and Improvement (Scotland) Act, 1862; (2) that the notice given by the Commissioners represented by the pursuer, of their intention to clear, level, macadamise, and form to their satisfaction the said piece of road was in terms of the said

No. 177.

July 16, 1887.
Youden v.
Jackson.

¹ See 4 Macph. at p. 1038.

No. 177.

July 16, 1887.
Youden v.
Jackson.

Act, and was published by handbills posted at the ends of Blackwood Place, and in a conspicuous place in the High Street of Leven: Find in law that the Commissioners of Police were entitled to execute the said operations, and that the notice thereof was duly given: Therefore dismiss the appeal, affirm the judgment of the Sheriff appealed against; of new decern in terms of the conclusions of the petition: Find the pursuer entitled to expenses in this Court; remit," &c.

J. & J. GALLETTLY, S.S.C.—JAMES SKINNER, S.S.C.—Agents.

No. 178.

July 16, 1887.
Buckner v.
Jopp's Trustees.

MRS JANET BUCKNER AND SPOUSE, Pursuers (Reclaimers).—

Rhind—A. S. D. Thomson.

ANDREW JOPP AND ANOTHER (Alexander Jopp's Trustees) AND OTHERS, Defenders (Respondents).—D.-F. Mackintosh—Murray—W. Campbell.

Trust—Transaction between trustees and beneficiaries—Mora.—A testator died in 1844. By his settlement he left legacies to A and to other persons to the amount of £17,000, and liferent annuities amounting to £100 per annum, but he died intestate quoad residue. His heritable and moveable estates were large, but he had extensive liabilities undertaken for three trading and manufacturing concerns, whose estates were conveyed to trustees named by him in security of his advances. He was also liable for annuities to the extent of £350, which did not admit of valuation.

In the years 1846 and 1847 the trustees made payment to the legatees of one-half of their legacies, but delayed payment of the remainder. In 1849 A and other legatees employed two law-agents to attend to their respective interests.

The trust affairs being very complicated, by direction of the trustees the firm of J. & S., their law-agents, laid the trust-accounts before an accountant. The accountant's reports, after estimating unrealised assets and liabilities, shewed that probably the trust-funds would not be sufficient to pay the legacies and testamentary annuities in full.

On 2d September 1851 the trustees, through their law-agents, offered to compromise the claims of the legatees by payment of the legacies in full without interest, on condition that they obtained from the legatees an assignation of their claims and a discharge from the next of kin. On 20th September 1851 this offer was accepted by the law-agents for the legatees and next of kin. Subsequently the trustees having discovered another liability of the deceased for £1700, proposed to resile from the agreement, but the agents for the legatees threatened legal proceedings if it was not implemented. In February 1852 a deed was executed by A as one of the legatees, and also as one of the next of kin, and by the other legatees and next of kin, by which, in consideration of the legacies having been paid in full, they assigned their whole claims against the trust to a person as trustee for J. & S. J., one of the partners of J. & S., was one of the trustees.

In 1886 the representatives of A raised a reduction of the deed of assignation and discharge against the representatives of the trustees, based on general averments of fraud, misrepresentation, and concealment and an averment that the pursuers had been greatly prejudiced by the deed, and on the plea that as the transaction involved the purchase of the trust-estate by one of the trustees, it was illegal. At the date of the action nearly all those who had taken part in bringing about the arrangement were dead.

The Court assolized the defenders, holding that fraud had not been proved, and that, quoad ultra, the action had not been timeously raised,—Lord Young and Lord Craighill further holding that no relevant ground of action had been stated.

2D DIVISION.
Lord Lee.
M.

HARRY LEITH LUMSDEN of Auchindoir, Aberdeenshire, died on 27th March 1844, leaving a trust-disposition and settlement, by which he conveyed his whole estates, heritable and moveable, to his wife, Mrs Leith Lumsden, John Jopp, W.S., Edinburgh, Henry Paterson, manager of the North of Scotland Bank at Aberdeen, and Alexander Jopp, advocate in Aberdeen, as trustees, nominating them also as his executors; in the first place, for payment of his debts, then to convey certain lands to persons named, and then for the payment of legacies to the amount of £17,000, and liferent annuities to the amount of £100 per annum, including a legacy to Mary Leith or Walker, one of his nieces, and her children, in the following terms:—"To Mary Leith, wife of John Walker, residing at Holburn, near Aberdeen, the sum of £750, to be secured to her in liferent, for alimentary use, and to be exclusive of her husband's jus mariti and right of administration, and to her family in fee, in such proportions as she may direct by any writing under her hand, and failing her leaving such writing, equally among them." The truster further directed his trustees to pay, divide, and dispose of the residue of his means and estate as he might appoint by any separate writing under his hand. The truster also left two codicils, but did not dispose of the residue of his estate. The testator, at the date of his death, was under obligation to pay annuities amounting to £350 per annum, which did not admit of valuation.

No. 178.

July 16, 1887.
Buckner v.
Jopp's Trustees.

Some years before Mr Lumsden's death three large trading firms in Aberdeen—Duffus & Company, iron-work manufacturers, James Forbes & Company, rope, sail, and twine manufacturers, and Forbes, Low, & Company, cotton-spinners and manufacturers—had got into difficulties, and Mr Lumsden, who was related to Mr James Forbes of Echt, a leading partner in each of the firms, agreed to interpose his credit and take the burden of the debts of the firms on himself, upon condition of trust-deeds being granted by each firm, and the partners thereof conveying their whole estates to trustees in security of his advances. Such deeds were accordingly granted, and Mr Lumsden had before his death made large advances in part implement of the obligations so undertaken by him, which advances were unpaid at his death.

The testamentary trustees, in 1846 and 1847, paid to the respective legatees one-half of their legacies, in all £8527, 2s. 6d., but delayed making payment of the remaining half, alleging that the extent of the obligations undertaken by the deceased to the firms just named being as yet uncertain, it was impossible to determine what the ultimate value of the estate left by him might be, but being pressed by the beneficiaries to have the trust closed, the trustees, in 1849, directed their agents, Messrs Jopp & Shand, advocates, Aberdeen (of which firm Mr Alexander Jopp, one of the trustees, was a partner), to send the whole accounts and vouchers of the testamentary trust, and of the three firm trusts, to Mr Donald Lindsay, accountant in Edinburgh, to be examined and audited. In consequence, Mr Lindsay prepared detailed reports, giving a statement of the affairs of the testamentary trust and of the three firm trusts, the former from the truster's death in 1844 to 1850, and the latter from their commencement in 1841 to 1850—both being ultimately continued down to 30th April 1851. These reports, in which an estimated value was put on the assets of the various trusts so far as unrealised, bore out, in the opinion of the testamentary trustees, their contention that it was not possible to make an immediate payment of the balance of the legacies out of the estate.

On 25th January 1851 Mr Lindsay's first report was sent to Mr Lachlan M'Kinnon junior, Aberdeen, who acted for a large number of the legatees and next of kin of the truster, and were examined by him and by his Edinburgh correspondent, Mr Charles Morton, W.S., and as the result of a meeting with the trustees in Edinburgh on 30th January, at which were present Messrs M'Kinnon and Morton, as well as several

No. 178.

July 16, 1887.
Buckner v.
Jopp's Trustees.

persons representing others interested in the testamentary trust, the whole accounts, vouchers, and reports connected with the various Lumsden trusts were sent to Mr M'Kinnon for detailed examination. He kept them in his hands till 28th April. On 2d May another meeting with the trustees was held, at which various objections to the reports were stated by Mr M'Kinnon and Mr Morton, and proposals for a settlement were suggested.

On 2d September Jopp & Johnston, W.S., the Edinburgh correspondents of Jopp & Shand, sent to Mr M'Kinnon, who had in the meanwhile been pressing the trustees to formulate their terms of settlement, and also to Mr John Duncan, advocate, Aberdeen, who represented certain others interested in the testamentary trust, a letter, in the following terms:—
“We are now authorised to submit to you the following proposal:—(1) That the legatees under the settlement of the late Mr Leith Lumsden shall, upon receiving payment of the balance of the capital of their legacies, assign their claims, and the next of kin, and parties who might be entitled to residue, if any, renounce and discharge their claims, and all exoner and discharge the trustees and executors of Mr Leith Lumsden, and approve of the states of the affairs prepared by Mr Lindsay; (2) the money to be payable within three weeks after all the legatees intimate their acceptance of the above terms. The acquiescence of all the legatees and next of kin is, of course, a condition of the arrangement. You will allow us to add, with reference to the time which has elapsed since a proposal was suggested, that both Messrs Jopp & Shand of Aberdeen and ourselves understood that a proposition to the above effect had already been made to Mr Morton through Mr Hunter. . . .”

On 4th September Mr M'Kinnon wrote to Mr Walker, the husband of the beneficiary specially referred to above, in these terms:—“I beg to enclose copy of a letter received by me yesterday from Messrs Jopp & Johnston of Edinburgh, proposing terms of settlement by the trustees to the legatees of the late Mr Leith Lumsden. From this letter you will observe that the trustees propose to pay to the legatees the balance of the capital of their legacies, on the condition that the latter and the nearest in kin forego their claim to interest and residue, abandon all objections to the management, and assign their rights in the estate to the trustees. It is a condition of this offer that all the legatees and nearest in kin accede to it. I beg to be favoured with your instructions in this matter. I have taken the liberty of recommending the acceptance of the proposal to others, and I think that all who are immediately benefited by it should accept it. There is much ground for dissatisfaction with the management, but I think the terms proposed are preferable to going into Court, and being subjected to the delay attending an action, the result of which, besides being distant, may be considered more or less uncertain. You will readily see that the parties who sacrifice most in assenting to the above terms are such of the nearest in kin as are not specially legatees under Mr Lumsden's deed of settlement, who thus renounced the whole of their interests, in order that others more favoured by Mr Lumsden may obtain payment of part of what was destined to them. It will be fortunate, if no obstacle be thrown in the way by the parties of whom I speak, in carrying out the arrangement proposed.” On 8th September Mr Walker replied:—“Received your letter upon the 6th. We are willing to do as the rest do, or what you think best. JOHN WALKER.”

On 20th September, Mr M'Kinnon having obtained the consent of the other legatees and next of kin, accepted Jopp & Johnston's offer of 2d September, but before the formal deed of assignation giving effect to the arrangement had been executed an additional liability affecting the trust-estate under a bond of caution for £1700 by Mr Lumsden, which had not been taken account of in Mr Lindsay's reports, was discovered, and the trustees were in consequence desirous of having the arrangement modified. Messrs M'Kinnon and Duncan, however, threatened legal proceedings to enforce the arrangement, and in the end the trustees yielded.

The deed of assignation and discharge was dated January and February 1852. Its material provisions are given below.* By it the granters, who

No. 178.

July 16, 1887.
Buckner v.
Jopp's Trustees.

* The deed was granted by all the legatees and by the heir-at-law and the next of kin of the truster, bearing " . . . I, Mrs Mary Leith or Walker, wife of John Walker, residing lately at Holborn, near Aberdeen, now in Inverury, with the special advice and consent of my said husband ; and I, the said John Walker, for my right and interest, and taking burden on me for my said spouse. . . . all being legatees or beneficiaries," and " We . . . the said Mary Leith or Walker, with consent of my said husband," and the said John Walker for his own right and interest, " . . . the next of kin of the said deceased Harry Leith Lumsden." It narrated the trust-disposition and settlement, and the payments under it already made by the trustees, and continued,—“And [considering] that the said trustees and executors having, by two several minutes, dated respectively the 21st day of November 1849 and 30th day of January 1851, remitted to Donald Lindsay, accountant in Edinburgh, to examine and audit the accounts of the intromissions of Messrs Jopp & Shand, advocates in Aberdeen, the cashiers and agents of the said trustees and executors with the deceased's means and estate, and the accounts of the trusts of James Forbes, Esq. of Echt, deceased ; Messrs John Duffus & Company, James Forbes & Company, and Forbes, Low, & Company, on account of whom the said deceased Harry Leith Lumsden had prior to his death come under large obligations and engagements, and in which he and his trustees and executors are interested : And that the said Donald Lindsay, having examined and audited said accounts of the deceased's trust from the date of the deceased's death up to the 30th day of April 1851, and of the other trusts above mentioned from the dates of commencement of the same respectively to the said 30th day of April, framed reports wherein the payments or investments made on account of the legacies and provisions under the deceased's settlement and codicils are stated, a value is put on the outstanding debts due to the deceased's estate, and the other property still remaining unrealised, and by which reports it appears there will be a probable deficiency of trust-funds to meet the payment of the liabilities of the deceased, and to pay in full the legacies and provisions left and bequeathed by him, and make provision for the annuities above mentioned, which reports are dated respectively the 9th day of November 1850 and the 2d day of May 1851 : And considering also that a considerable length of time may yet elapse before the remainder of the deceased's means and estate can be realised, especially as it is necessary before this can be accomplished that the various trusts above referred to should be wound up, and that therefore it has been deemed expedient to settle with the legatees and those interested in the deceased's estate, in order to bring the trust to a speedier conclusion : And whereas, upon the suggestion of the said Messrs Jopp & Shand, a proposal has been made to the legatees offering to pay to them the balance of the capital of their legacies without interest, which proposal has been accepted by the legatees and beneficiaries under the deceased's settlement and codicils foresaid, and is to the following effect :—1st, That the legatees shall, upon receiving payment of the balance of the capital of their legacies, assign their claims, and the next of kin and parties who may be entitled to a residue, if any, renounce and discharge their claims, and all exoner and discharge the trustees and executors of the said deceased Harry Leith Lumsden, and approve of the estates of the affairs prepared by the said Donald Lindsay before referred to ; 2d, that the money shall be payable within three weeks after all the legatees intimate their acceptance of the above terms, the acceptance of all the legatees and next of kin being a condition of said arrangement : And whereas we, the parties hereto legatees and beneficiaries foresaid, have agreed to accept the said offer, and to grant the discharge, exoneration, and assignation under written ; and we, the next in kin of the deceased

No. 178.

July 16, 1887.
Buckner v.
Jopp's Trustees.

were the whole legatees, the heir-at-law and the next of kin of Mr Lumsden, discharged his testamentary trustees of their whole intromissions, on and parties who would have been entitled to the residue, if any, have agreed to concur and join in said discharge, exoneration, and assignation: And whereas the annuities before mentioned and other annuities which the deceased was at the time of his death under obligation to pay or provide for have been secured by bond granted by Alexander Abercrombie, Esquire, residing in Aberdeen, and the said Messrs Jopp & Shand, as a company, and by Alexander Jopp and Robert Shand, both advocates in Aberdeen, the individual partners of that firm, as individuals, bearing date the

: And now, seeing that the said Messrs Jopp & Shand have, in terms of the foresaid arrangement, and in consideration of our granting these presents, instantly advanced and paid to us as follows, videlicet." The deed then set forth the payment of the various legacies, including the deposit in bank of a sum sufficient to meet the respective liferent and fee of Mrs Walker and her children; and continued:—"And seeing that the said trustees and executors have by the hands of the said Messrs Jopp & Shand thus implemented their part of the arrangement above narrated: Therefore we, the parties hereto who are legatees and beneficiaries under the foresaid trust-disposition and settlement and codicils, or representatives of legatees and beneficiaries, do hereby, in implement of our part of the arrangement above narrated, and for our respective rights and interests in the premises as legatees and beneficiaries foresaid, and with consents foresaid, exoner, acquit, and simpliciter discharge the said trustees and executors and all others, the representatives of the said deceased Harry Leith Lumsden, deceased, of the whole actings, transactions, intromissions, and management of the said trustees and executors, had by them or by their said cashiers and agents, or any of them, under or in consequence of the said trust, or in relation thereto, any manner of way, but under reservation always in favour of the said Alexander Abercrombie, our assignee, of all claim, right, and interest competent to him under the assignation hereinafter written." Then followed a similar renunciation and discharge by the truster's heir-at-law and next of kin (including Mrs Walker, with consent of her husband, and her husband for his own right and interest), of any claim competent to them "for the residue of his estate, heritable or moveable, if such there be, or should hereafter arise . . . And we, the whole parties hereto, do hereby, in so far as we are interested in the estates of the said deceased Harry Leith Lumsden under his said deed of settlement and codicils, or ab intestato, ratify, homologate, and approve of the foresaid reports and relative states by the said Donald Lindsay, and of the whole actings and intromissions of the said trustees and of their cashiers and agents, as well detailed as not detailed therein . . . And farther, in implement of our part of the said arrangement above narrated, and at the special request of the said Jopp & Shand, and with consent of said trustees and executors, we, . . . the said Isobel Leith or Hay, Mary Leith or Walker, Catherine Leith or Smith, now Hay, with advice and consent of our said husbands: And we, the said Peter Hay, John Walker, and Arthur Hay, for our respective rights and interests, and as taking burden on us for our said spouses respectively, at the special request of the said Messrs Jopp & Shand, and with consent of the said trustees and executors, do hereby make and constitute the said Alexander Abercrombie and his foresaids our cessioners and assignees, not only in and to the sums of money before mentioned appointed by said deed of settlement and codicils to be invested for behoof of us and of our said families, to the extent of the amounts now advanced by the said Messrs Jopp & Shand, and invested for behoof as aforesaid, with all claim competent to us respectively for arrears of annualrent upon the foresaid sums so advanced and invested from and after the period at which the same ought to have been invested for behoof foresaid, in terms of the said trust-disposition and settlement and codicils, but also in and to the said trust-disposition and settlement and codicils, whole clauses, tenor, and contents thereof, to the extent of the said sums advanced and invested as aforesaid, to the end and effect that the said Alexander Abercrombie consideration of the legatees having received payment of the balance of their legacies from Jopp & Shand, the agents to the trust. The granters further assigned and conveyed their whole interests in the estate to Mr Alexander Abercrombie, who was an uncle of Alexander Jopp of Jopp & Shand, and who had become responsible for the payment of the balance of the legacies. The heir-at-law and the next of kin assigned their rights to the residue without receiving any pecuniary consideration therefor. The deed was signed for Mrs Walker by two notaries, their docquets bearing that they were authorised to subscribe for her "both as a legatee and one of the nearest in kin of the said deceased Harry Leith Lumsden." About the same date the trustees (who had signed as consenters to the assignation and discharge), on the narrative that Messrs Jopp & Shand "have agreed to relieve us of all outstanding claims against the trust, upon our conveying and assigning to them, or to a party to be named by them, the whole remaining trust property, claims, and assets," conveyed the whole assets to Mr Abercrombie. Thereafter, on 7th June 1858, Mr Abercrombie granted a back-bond in favour of Messrs Jopp & Shand, acknowledging that the said conveyance had been granted to him in trust for the following purposes, viz.—That the said assets should be realised at the sight of and according to the directions of Messrs Jopp & Shand, and the proceeds thereof applied by them—(1) in implementing the arrangement with the beneficiaries; (2) in paying all other claims against the trust-estate; (3) in relieving Mr Abercrombie of his obligations under the bond of 9th February 1852; and (4) for behoof of Messrs Jopp & Shand. Thereafter by disposition and assignation, dated 3d November 1866, Abercrombie divested himself of the whole property and assets, and conveyed the same to Alexander Jopp, then the sole surviving partner of Jopp & Shand, and at the same time Jopp granted to Abercrombie and his heirs a bond of relief from all the obligations which he had undertaken. In this way Alexander Jopp acquired from the body of trustees of which he was one, with the consent of the legatees and next of kin, the whole remaining trust property and assets in consideration of the assignation and discharge of 1852 and the payments therein recited. The payments which Jopp & Shand undertook to make were all duly made, including the deposit in bank of a sum to meet the liferent and fee of Mrs Walker and her family. On the death of Mrs Walker in 1871 her children, including Mrs Janet Walker or Buckner, received payment of the capital of the sum liferented by her, and granted a discharge in favour of the trustees therefor.

This was an action raised on 22d June 1886 at the instance of Mrs Janet Walker or Buckner as executor-dative of her father (to whom her mother's rights as one of Mr Lumsden's next of kin passed jure mariti), and his foresaids may recover payment of the foresaid sums respectively and arrears of annualrent thereon, out of and from the trust means and estate of the said deceased Harry Leith Lumsden . . . and we the said [next of kin] make, constitute, and appoint the said Alexander Abercrombie, his heirs, executors, and successors, our lawful cessioners and assignees, in and to all and whatever claims we or may be competent to us as next of kin of the said deceased Harry Leith Lumsden, whether arising out of the foresaid deed of settlement and codicils, or ab intestato by and through his death." The whole parties then surrogated and substituted Abercrombie and his foresaids in their full rights and place in the premises, with full power to him and them to expedite titles, to sue, and generally to do everything concerning the premises that the granters themselves might have done. The deed contained a declaration that the trustees and Mr Abercrombie "shall have no right or claim for repetition on us for any part of the said sums now paid to us or invested for our behoof on any ground whatever."

No. 178.

July 16, 1887.
Buckner v.
Jopp's Trustees.

No. 178. and Charles Buckner her husband, against the representatives of Mr Lumsden's trustees, for reduction of the assignation and discharge of 1852.
 July 16, 1887.
 Buckner v.
 Jopp's Trustees.

The pursuers, after narrating the substance of Mr Lumsden's trust-disposition and settlement and of the deed under reduction, averred:—(Concl. 8) "It is believed and averred that the said [Lindsay's] reports were materially inaccurate, and proceeded upon information supplied by the trustees and Messrs Jopp & Shand to Mr Lindsay, in the full knowledge that it was erroneous, and with the intention of misleading him, and that, in place of the estate being unable to pay the liabilities and provisions before referred to, it was not only able to do so, but there was a large surplus, which fell to be divided among the next of kin. It is believed and averred that, as the said trustees and Messrs Jopp & Shand well knew, the only interest which the said Harry Leith Lumsden had in the estate of James Forbes, Duffus, & Co., James Forbes & Co., and Forbes, Low, & Co., was that of a creditor, whereas the said trustees, and Messrs Jopp & Shand, in the said discharge and assignation, and in the proceedings and communings preliminary to the same, falsely and fraudulently represented to the granters thereof that the estate was under heavy obligations and engagements for these parties, and thereby induced them, under essential error, to grant the same. In the inventory of the personal estate of the said Harry Leith Lumsden, given up by the said trustees, are included items amounting to about £10,000, as due by these parties to the deceased, and it is believed and averred that the deceased held ample security for payment thereof. The only interest which he had in their estates was in so far as he was a creditor for these sums. It is, further, believed and averred that the said trustees, or their law-agents, in place of devoting the estate of the said Harry Leith Lumsden, as they realised it, to the purposes of the trust, applied it to purposes not sanctioned by, and of a nature contrary to the terms of the trust. It is believed and averred that, if the estate shewed a deficiency at the dates of these reports, the deficiency arose from the improper and illegal actings of the trustees, or the said Messrs Jopp & Shand, or one or other of them. The investments of the said Harry Leith Lumsden were, for the greater part, of a first-class character, and the discharge and assignation and report bear that the whole, or nearly the whole, of the estate had, prior to its date, been realised. It is believed that Duffus & Co., James Forbes, Forbes & Co., and Forbes, Low, & Co. granted trust-deeds in favour of Mr Paterson and Mr Alexander Jopp prior to the death of Mr Leith Lumsden. In the accounts produced by the defenders the trustees take credit for the sum of £20,600, as having been paid by them in satisfaction of obligations alleged to have been undertaken by the deceased Mr Leith Lumsden to the creditors of Mr Forbes and the said firms. It is believed and averred that no such obligations had been undertaken by him, or, at all events, that they were not of such a nature as to warrant the trustees in continuing, after his death, to pay the said creditors, and that these payments were wrongfully and improperly included in the account. The defenders are called upon to produce the obligations in consequence of which these payments required to be made. Further, the said accounts include large business accounts and commissions charged by Messrs Jopp & Shand for services performed. These charges are illegal, as Mr Jopp was a trustee as well as law-agent, and no provision is made in the settlement of the deceased that a trustee shall be entitled to charge fees. Further, in the said accounts, a sum of £4925 is debited against the personal estate as the amount of claims for meliorations made by the tenants of the lands of the deceased. It is admitted in said reports that the same were then disputed by the executor, and that no part thereof had been paid. It is averred that the personal estate was not liable for these claims, and it is also averred that no part thereof has ever been paid. The same were payable out of the lands of which the claimants were tenants. The testator held most of his lands in fee-simple. The defenders are called upon to state specifically what sums they allege to have been paid on these grounds. In the report, dated 2d May 1851, there is a statement made of the assets of the estate at that date, which are stated to be worth £14,542, 15s. 2d., but it is believed and averred that this list is grossly undervalued, and does not include all the assets of the estate. It is believed and averred that the assets detailed in that report yielded much more than the value put upon them. The defenders are called upon to lodge an account shewing the sums actually received by Messrs Jopp & Shand out of the estate conveyed to them, subsequent to the report by Mr Lindsay, dated 2d May 1851. There was no necessity for the said discharge and assignation, as the trustees had, at the date thereof, more cash on hand and available for the purpose of paying the grantors of the said discharge and assignation the sums due to them as legatees and next of kin than was required to pay the outstanding debts and balance of legacies, &c. The report of 2d May 1851 shews conclusively that there was a surplus. In that report the assets therein specified, though the whole were not included, and though they were grossly undervalued, are estimated to exceed the debts therein mentioned, which then formed the entire claims against the estate, with the exception of the balance of the legacies and annuities, by the sum of . . . £7,732 1 4

But there was wrongfully included in the accounts the following items:—

Payments made to tenants of estates for meliorations,	£535	11	1
Sums claimed by the tenants, and unpaid,	4925	0	0
Account for business performed by parties who were trustees,	2267	11	3
				<hr/>
				7,728 2 4
				<hr/>
Total amount of assets,	£15,460	3	8
The payments to be made were:—
Balance of legacies,	£8238	7	6
Payments to annuitants,	4070	0	0
				<hr/>
				12,308 7 6
				<hr/>
Surplus,	£3,151	16	2

If Mr Lachlan M'Kinnon, advocate, Aberdeen, attended on behalf of the female pursuer's father and mother before the reporter, Mr Lindsay, and stated objections to them, he failed in stating objections thereto of the most obvious nature. . . . The first report of Mr Lindsay was made before Mr M'Kinnon professed to examine the accounts."

The defenders answered;—(Ans. 8) "Admitted that Mr Lindsay's first report was prior in date to Mr M'Kinnon's examination of the accounts, and explained that the object of the trustees in remitting the accounts to Mr Lindsay was to obtain from a neutral accountant of acknowledged eminence a report which would enable them and all parties interested to form a judgment as to the actual position of the trust, and the course that ought to be pursued in the future. Quoad ultra denied. The pursuers are called on to state details as to the erroneous information alleged to have been supplied to Mr Lindsay, with the intention of misleading him,

No. 178.

July 16, 1857.
Buckner v.
The Jopp's Trustees.

No. 178.

July 16, 1887.
Buckner v.
Jopp's Trustees.

and to specify the particulars in which he was deceived. They are also called upon to give a specification of the alleged misapplication of funds by the trustees or their law-agents, and to specify the payments to creditors of Mr Forbes and his firms which they allege were improperly made. . . . Only a comparatively trifling portion of the liabilities so undertaken by Mr Leith Lumsden was extinguished during his lifetime, and the remainder (far exceeding in amount the sum of £20,600, which his trustees and executors were ultimately called upon to pay) constituted a valid claim against his trust-estate. The sum of £10,000, which appears in the inventory, represents merely the amount due, as at that date, to the testator by Mr Forbes or his firms, but does not represent the liabilities undertaken by him on their account, and which were enforceable against his estate. With reference to the claim for meliorations, it is explained that the trustees had been advised by eminent counsel that the trust-estate was liable therefor. The sums objected to by the pursuers as having been paid for meliorations were so paid in pursuance of decrees obtained against the trustees in the Court of Session and Sheriff Court. At the date of Mr Lindsay's second report, further claims to the amount of £3553 had been intimated to the trustees, and it was probable that others would emerge, raising the sum total to the amount estimated in the said report. With reference to Messrs Jopp & Shand's professional accounts, it is averred that the charges therein were reasonable in amount, and for work by which the estate had benefited, and that the accounts, after being audited by Mr Lindsay, were approved of by all the parties interested, and their legal advisers. It is further averred that Mr M'Kinnon stated and urged, on behalf of his clients (including Mr and Mrs Walker), every objection to the accounts suggested by his legal knowledge and experience. After mature deliberation, however, and a full examination of the accounts, he advised his clients not to insist upon these objections, as, in his opinion, it was more for their interests to agree to the compromise then under consideration. This opinion was well founded. It is specially denied that at the date of the said discharge and assignation the trustees were in a position to pay the balance of the legacies in full. On the contrary, at that date there was every prospect that years might elapse before this could be accomplished, if it ever could be accomplished. . . . It is averred that the unrealised assets are stated in Mr Lindsay's report at a fair and full estimate of their value at that date. The pursuers are called upon to specify the items which they allege to have been undervalued as at that date, and also the trust assets, to which they refer as having been wholly omitted. . . ."

The pursuers further averred;—(Cond. 9) "Messrs Jopp & Shand were the law-agents of the trust, and Mr Alexander Jopp, one of the partners of the firm, was one of the trustees. The terms of settlement to which the said Mary Leith or Walker and husband agreed were, as disclosed by the discharge and assignation, suggested by the said Jopp & Shand. The said discharge and assignation bears that the legacies, or balance of the legacies, were paid by Messrs Jopp & Shand, and that it was at their request that the said Mary Leith or Walker and husband assigned all their interests in the said estate to the said Alexander Abercrombie. The said Alexander Abercrombie was an uncle of the said Alexander Jopp, and in reality the assignation was one in favour of Jopp & Shand. . . . The said Mary Leith or Walker and John Walker were not represented by any law-agent; at anyrate, they were not represented by a neutral agent. Mr Lachlan M'Kinnon, who is alleged to have acted for them, acted for a great number of other parties who were simply legatees, and whose interest conflicted with that of the pursuers' father and mother. They did not understand the meaning of the discharge and assignation, and the signature of Mrs Walker was adhibited notarially. The said discharge and assignation was impetrated from them by fraud, and granted by them on misrepresentations and under essential error. It was entered into by them on the footing that it applied only to the legacy, and they were not at its date aware that they were interested in the residue, or that there was or could be any residue. The position of the estate was not explained to them, and the accounts of the trust were not submitted to them for consideration. They were kept entirely in ignorance of their rights and of the true position of the estate. In point of fact the accounts of the trust were not submitted to them or their family until after the institution of the present proceedings, though the defenders had previously lodged three separate defences, and though, prior to the institution of the present proceedings, the pursuers offered to pay the law-agents of the defenders their fees for lending them the papers of the trust, and though the female pursuer has repeatedly, long prior to the present time, called upon the agents of the defenders for explanation regarding the estate. . . . The pretended purchase or acquisition was for a grossly inadequate consideration. It is believed and averred that the said Jopp & Shand realised a sum largely in excess of the sums they are alleged to have paid to the beneficiaries out of the estate assigned to them."

No. 178.

July 16, 1887.
Buckner v.
Jopp's Trustees.

The defenders answered,—(Ans. 9) "The discharge and assignation is referred to. Admitted that it bears that the terms of settlement had been suggested by Messrs Jopp & Shand; but explained that upon the emerging of the new cautionary liability, . . . they desired to resile from the offer which they had previously made, and would have done so if the legatees and next of kin (including Mr and Mrs Walker) had not insisted upon the proposal being carried out according to its terms, and threatening legal proceedings if this were not done. . . . Denied that the interest of Mr M'Kinnon's other clients conflicted with that of Mr and Mrs Walker. Mrs Walker was a legatee, and her interest was to obtain payment of her legacy, and without further delay; which, as she and her husband well knew, could be accomplished only by the proposed arrangement being carried out, and upon condition of the heir-at-law, who had right to so much of the residue as was heritable, and next of kin discharging their claim to the residue (if any). Mr M'Kinnon acted for the heir-at-law and for all the next of kin, of whom some were and some were not also legatees. . . ."

The pursuers pleaded;—(1) The said discharge and assignation having been granted truly in favour of one of the trustees, it is null and void. (2) The said discharge and assignation having been granted truly in favour of the law-agents of the trust, it is null and void. (3) The said discharge and assignation having been impetrated by fraud, misrepresentation, and concealment, decree of reduction ought to be granted as craved. (4) Separatim, The said discharge and assignation having been granted under essential error, decree of reduction ought to be pronounced.

The defenders pleaded;—(1) The pursuers have no title to sue, at least none such as is libelled. (2) The averments of the pursuers are not relevant or sufficient to entitle them to have the discharge and assignation of 1852 set aside. (3) In the circumstances, the action is barred by mora and taciturnity, and by the actings of the pursuers. (4) The pursuers are barred personali exceptione from pursuing this action, inasmuch as they participated in 1872 in the division of the £750 which was obtained as the price paid by Jopp & Shand to the female pursuer's mother and father

No. 178. for what they assigned to Mr Abercrombie in 1852. (5) The defenders are entitled to absolver, in respect that the pursuers' averments are unfounded in fact, and that the discharge and assignation in question was granted by Mr and Mrs Walker after complete information and investigation, in the full knowledge of their rights and of the nature of the transaction, with legal assistance and advice, and for a full and sufficient consideration. (6) So far as the trustees and executors of Mr Lumsden are concerned with the transaction, they became parties to it at the request of the beneficiaries, including the female pursuer's father and mother, and she cannot challenge their acts.

July 16, 1887.
Buckner v.
Jopp's Trustees.

A proof was allowed. The facts stated in the foregoing narrative appeared from the evidence. The only witness of those who had taken part in the negotiations which led to the assignation and discharge of 1852 was Mr M'Kinnon, who acted as law-agent for Mrs Walker and other legatees and next of kin. Portions of his evidence are given below.*

* Being asked in cross-examination "(Q.) Did you inquire whether the trustees had been applied to to fulfil that cautionary obligation?" Mr M'Kinnon deposed,—"(A.) My information was contained in the trust-accounts and Mr Lindsay's report. I assumed that Mr Lindsay's report accurately set forth the position of matters. I knew that Mr Lindsay had got his information entirely from Jopp & Johnston. . . . (Q.) Where did you understand the money was to come from that was to pay the legacies in full? (A.) It was for Mr Jopp to raise that. (Q.) Did you not think it a very extraordinary thing that trustees should raise funds on their own private responsibility to pay legatees? (A.) I don't know. Considering the state of the trust, I thought it was highly desirable that they should do so. (Q.) Unless the trustees had done something wrong, they were not bound to raise the money themselves? (A.) Very likely; but there had been something wrong, because the trust had been mismanaged; we saw that. (Q.) Mismanaged to the extent of making the trustees personally responsible? (A.) Well, we believed so. (Q.) In what respects? (A.) In many respects—not realising the assets in time, for one thing; that was the chief thing. (Q.) Was it not the case that you found that the trustees had realised the estate and had applied it improperly to their own purposes? (A.) I could not say that. . . . (Q.) Did you not think it was odd that a conveyance should be made to Mr Abercrombie by the residuary legatees, Mr Abercrombie paying nothing and the residuary legatees getting nothing? (A.) I thought there was nothing extraordinary in Mr Abercrombie being assignee at all. He was assisting Mr Jopp, as I thought and believed. Very likely he advanced the money for Mr Jopp; my belief was that he did, but I could not say that he did. (Q.) What was his interest in the matter? (A.) Just to assist his nephew, Mr Jopp, out of a scrape; that is as I read it at the time. (Q.) Had you and Mr Jopp any talk about the scrape into which he had fallen? (A.) I am calling it a scrape, but Mr Jopp never spoke of it in that way at all, nor did I either to Mr Jopp. . . . It was contemplated from the very first that if there was any residue it should go to Jopp & Shand. (Q.) Why to them? (A.) Because they were advancing the money for the trustees, as I understood it. (Q.) You mean Jopp & Shand? (A.) Or Mr Jopp, I should rather say. (Q.) Was it to go to Jopp & Shand personally, or to them as agents for the trustees? (A.) Personally, certainly; as they were advancing the money for the trustees, it was to reimburse them for the advances they were to make to us. . . . (Q.) Would it not have been well if you had made a provision that, if the estate had turned out more than sufficient to repay Jopp & Shand, the balance should go to the next of kin? (A.) If there had been any reasonable prospect to suppose that such a result could take place we would have done so, but neither I nor Mr Morton believed that they would get themselves what they were to give us. . . . (Q.) Did you ever tell John Walker that you did not believe there would be any reversion? (A.) I have no doubt I did; I told him

The import of the proof as to the value of the estate is given in the No. 178.
 Lord Ordinary's opinion.

On 14th April 1887 the Lord Ordinary (Lee) pronounced this interlocutor:—"Finds that the discharge and assignation in question was not obtained by fraud, misrepresentation, or concealment, and that the same was not granted under essential error: Finds that it was the result of a transaction to which the pursuers' authors were parties, acting under the advice of an independent law-agent, duly authorised to act on their behalf, and from whom no information regarding the trust-accounts was withheld: Finds that in said transaction no advantage was taken by the deceased Alexander Jopp, or by his firm of Jopp & Shand, of information acquired in a fiduciary character; and finds, further, that the said transaction was acted on and confirmed by the pursuers' authors: Therefore assoilzies the defenders from the conclusions of the summons, and decerns: Finds the pursuers liable in the expense of process," &c.*

July 16, 1887.
 Buckner v.
 Jopp's Trustees.

all; I had no concealment from anybody. (Q.) But did you tell him you thought there would be no reversion? (A.) I have not the least doubt of it. (Q.) It was in the belief that that was true that he signed the discharge? (A.) He took my advice. . . . (Q.) May I take it generally that you made a special examination, on the one side, of the assets and what they amounted to, and, on the other, of the amount of the estimated liabilities? (A.) To the best of our ability we did. (Q.) And the outstanding assets also? (A.) Certainly; they were a material point. (Q.) Did you consider these in the light of your local knowledge as a man of business in Aberdeen? (A.) I did, and I thought there would be more likely to be a deficiency than a surplus. . . . (Q.) To what extent did you go behind Mr Lindsay's reports in the way of examination? (A.) By checking his values of the unrealised assets simply. (Q.) What books or accounts did you examine other than Mr Lindsay's reports? (A.) None, as to the figures. (Q.) But as to anything? (A.) We checked the values which they gave us as representing the amount of the unrealised assets. (Q.) And that was the extent to which you went behind Mr Lindsay's reports? (A.) I suppose chiefly so. (Q.) When you say that you checked the estimates put on the unrealised assets by Mr Lindsay, do you mean simply that you went over them and estimated them for yourself? (A.) Simply, that is all I did. . . ."

* "OPINION.—This is a reduction of a discharge and assignation granted in 1852 by the legatees and next of kin of Harry Leith Lumsden, of Auchindoir, who died in the year 1844, leaving considerable means and estates, which, however, were deeply involved by reason of liabilities which he had contracted in connection with certain mercantile firms.

"By the deed in question the granters discharged Mr Lumsden's trustees of their whole intromissions, and, both as legatees and as next of kin entitled to the undisposed of residue, they also assigned and conveyed to Mr Alexander Abercrombie (the uncle of Mr Alexander Jopp, who was one of the trustees and also one of the agents for the trust) their whole interests in the trust-estate. The trustees were parties to the deed, and consented to a reservation in favour of Mr Abercrombie, notwithstanding the discharge of all claim and right competent to him under this assignation, 'to the end and effect that the said Alexander Abercrombie and his forebears may recover payment of the foresaid sums respectively, and arrears of annualrent thereon, out of and from the trust means and estate of the said deceased Harry Leith Lumsden.' Mr Abercrombie was also surrogated and substituted by the heir-at-law and next of kin in their full rights and place, with power to him to expedite titles, and to ask, crave, sue for, and uplift the sums of money, principal and interest, thereby assigned, 'and generally to do every other thing concerning the premises that we or any of us might have done ourselves before granting hereof.'

"Now, Mr Abercrombie, it is admitted, was a mere trustee for Messrs Jopp & Shand, who made, or undertook to make, the payments mentioned in the deed as the consideration for which it was granted, and for which he became

No. 178.

July 16, 1887.
Buckner v.
Jopp's Trustees.

The pursuers reclaimed, and argued;—The legatees and next of kin of Mr Lumsden had discharged his testamentary trustees, and no question cautioner. The considerations mentioned as the cause of granting this deed are, that it appeared from a certain report by Mr Donald Lindsay upon the trust-accounts that there would be a probable deficiency of trust-funds to meet the payment of the liabilities of the deceased, and to pay in full the legacies and provisions left and bequeathed by him, and to make provision for certain annuities to which his estates were subject; also that a considerable length of time might yet elapse before the remainder of the deceased's means and estate could be realised, 'especially as it is necessary before this can be accomplished that the various trusts above referred to should be wound up, and that therefore it had been deemed expedient to settle with the legatees and those interested in the deceased's estate, in order to bring the trust to a speedier conclusion'; also that, upon the suggestion of the said Messrs Jopp & Shand, a proposal had been made and agreed to, whereby, upon payment to the legatees of the balance of the capital of their legacies, they should assign their claims 'and the next of kin and parties who may be entitled to a residue (if any) renounce and discharge their claims; and all exoner and discharge the trustees and executors of the said deceased Harry Leith Lumsden, and approve of the states of the affair prepared by the said Donald Lindsay before referred to'; and further, that Messrs Jopp & Shand had, in terms of the arrangement, made or provided for the stipulated payments.

"The result of the deed was, that Mr Abercrombie, in security of his claims of relief against Messrs Jopp & Shand, obtained a conveyance of the whole outstanding assets of the trust; and that subsequently, upon Mr Abercrombie's claims of relief being satisfied, these assets were conveyed by him, with the consent of Mr Shand's trustees, to Mr Alexander Jopp, then the sole surviving trustee of Mr Lumsden.—(See disposition and assignation of 1866, No. 144 of process.) It appears from the defenders' statement (art. 24) that Mr Abercrombie had previously obtained a conveyance from the trustees of the whole remaining trust-property, claims, and assets, in consideration of Jopp & Shand having relieved them of all outstanding claims against the trust.

"Mr Alexander Jopp thus acquired from the body of trustees, of which he was one, with the consent of the legatees and next of kin, the whole remaining trust-property and assets, in consideration of the discharge under reduction, and the payments therein recited. I think that such a transaction could not have been maintained in law as against any person interested who was not a party to it, or did not directly confirm it. For it is a well-settled and deeply-seated principle in the law of Scotland that a party in a fiduciary character cannot be auctor in rem suam. A tutor cannot buy from his ward, or from himself as tutor; and a trustee, whose duty it is to administer an estate for others, cannot enter into any contract, accruing to his own benefit, with the trust-estate. It is quite unnecessary to refer to authorities upon this point. The case of The Aberdeen Railway Company v. Blaikie Brothers (1 M'Queen, 461) is but an illustration of a principle previously well known in the law of Scotland. But it is equally well settled that such a transaction is not absolutely void, but only voidable. It might be taken out of the reach of challenge by the direct confirmation of the party interested to object to it, or by such homologation, or such acquiescence and lapse of time, as must be held equivalent to direct confirmation. This is illustrated by the case of Fraser v. Hankey (9 D. 415), and is not, I think, questioned in the opinions of the Judges in Thorburn v. Martin (15 D. 845). Indeed, it is expressly assumed to be law in the opinion of Lord Wood. In a recent case in the Second Division of the Court, it does not seem to have been doubted that even a conveyance by a client to his agent, for certain good causes and considerations, but without value given, might be put beyond the reach of challenge by confirmation.¹

"Now, in the present case, the only persons interested to challenge the deed

¹ See Logan's Trustees v. Reid, June 13, 1885, 12 R. 1094.

arose between them on that point; but they had also assigned their whole rights to Abercrombie, who was acting for Jopp, of Jopp & Shand, the

No. 178.

July 16, 1887.

Buckner v.
Jopp's Trustees.

were parties to it, and took benefit under it. The pursuer has no title or interest to sue, excepting only that of executor of one of them, viz., the testator's niece, Mrs Mary Leith or Walker, and her husband, Mr John Walker.

"The fact that Mr and Mrs Walker were parties to the transaction, and that the transaction was one by which an adequate consideration was obtained by them as beneficiaries under the trust, might not have been sufficient to exclude challenge at their instance. I think that, so long as matters were entire, they would have had an option to set aside the deed, at least in so far as in favour of Mr Jopp, unless it were made clear that all knowledge of the value of the property acquired by him was communicated to them. If, however, it does appear that the beneficiaries were dealt with at arm's length, and that there was a full disclosure to their agent of everything known to the trustees in respect of the property, and that the beneficiaries, with this knowledge, not only became parties to the deed, but acted on it, took the benefit of it, and allowed the trustees to act on it for a long period of years, and until it has become impossible to restore matters to the condition in which they were at the time of the transaction, then I think that the beneficiaries must be held to have confirmed the deed, and to have abandoned their option of setting it aside.

"There is, no doubt, serious difficulty in reconciling with principle the doctrine that a purchase by a trustee from himself of subjects which he holds in trust for others, and as to which the duty undertaken by him is that of realising them for the best advantage of the beneficiaries, may be validated by the beneficiaries' consent. It is very difficult to say that a transaction which was illegal in the sense of being against a general principle of jurisprudence cannot be questioned at any time by the person interested to challenge it. Beyond all question such challenge could not be excluded if the illegal character of the transaction was concealed, if the beneficiary had reason to believe that the purchase was by a third party, and was ignorant of the fact that that third party truly represented one of the trustees (which seems to have been the case in Thorburn v. Martin), or if the beneficiary was not represented by a separate agent having access to all necessary information. But, on the other hand, it is not less difficult to allow a party to set aside a transaction, who has by his own conduct made it impossible to restore matters to their original position, and who cannot say that he was unfairly dealt with. Perhaps it is a sufficient solution of these difficulties to say that the transaction may be maintained if the trustee can shew that everything was done with full knowledge on the part of the beneficiary, and provided it be ascertained that there was no fraud, no concealment, and no advantage taken by the trustee of information acquired by him in that character.

"In the present case the deed under reduction contains so full a narrative of the circumstances in which it was granted that, unless there is error in that narrative, or fraud, the question whether the transaction can be maintained admits of being decided almost entirely upon the terms of the deed itself. A proof has been taken, the result of which, in my opinion, is to shew that the recital of the deed was substantially correct, and that the pursuers' allegations of fraud, misrepresentation, and concealment are unfounded. The attempt to repudiate or discredit the actings of Mr M'Kinnon, as agent for the pursuers' father and mother, has entirely failed. The genuineness of the letters written by John Walker on behalf of his wife to Mr M'Kinnon as such agent has been placed beyond a doubt, notwithstanding the somewhat unscrupulous endeavour of the female pursuer to dispute her father's handwriting. Mr M'Kinnon's evidence shews that no information was withheld from him. The reports of Mr Donald Lindsay on the trustees' accounts were fully before him, and were fully discussed by him and the other agents interested, including Mr Charles Morton, W.S., and Mr Alexander Hunter, W.S., of the firm of Hunter, Blair,

No. 178. law-agents to the trust, and himself a trustee, with the result that Jopp, or his representatives, had made a profit out of the transaction of £10,000;
July 16, 1887.
Buckner v. Jopp's Trustees.

& Cowan, than whom no more highly qualified advisers could be named. No doubt Mr Lindsay's reports were founded upon information obtained from Messrs Jopp & Shand, as agents and cashiers of the trust. But this appears on the face of them; and the beneficiaries' agents were thus invited, or at least prompted, to look behind these, and to test for themselves the statements they contain, and particularly the accuracy of the values placed upon the outstanding assets. I think that there can be no doubt upon the proof that they did so inquire into the accuracy of these reports; and that Mr M'Kinnon satisfied himself that they might be relied on as substantially correct, is clear from his own statement. But even if Mr M'Kinnon had neglected his duty as an agent, the defenders could not on that account be held responsible. He admits that everything was placed at his disposal which he required, and that he satisfied himself that the transaction was a good one for his clients, and one which, therefore, he insisted on being carried out when Jopp & Shand desired to withdraw from it, on the discovery of some additional liabilities.

"The letters of the Rev. Harry Leith, the brother of Mary Leith or Walker, the pursuer's author, prove that he believed and asserted that he had authority to employ Mr M'Kinnon on behalf of his sisters; and John Walker's letters prove that he and his wife knew and assented to such employment, and consented beforehand to the transaction.

"But it is said that there was an essential error in the deed, in so far as it proceeds on the narrative that there would be a probable deficiency of trust-funds to meet the liabilities and pay the legacies. I think that it may be taken as the result of the proof (although the matter is left extremely vague and uncertain) that the assets of the trust turned out on the whole somewhat better than was expected, and that Mr Jopp in the end proved to be a gainer and not a loser by the transaction. But it is certainly not proved that the beneficiaries would have got more than they obtained under this arrangement if they had insisted on their rights, and had made it necessary that the trustees should keep up the trust until all the annuities came to an end, and all the assets, including the complicated claims of the truster upon the estate of Mr Forbes of Echt, and the estates of Duffus & Company, James Forbes & Company, and Forbes, Low, & Company, had been adjusted and settled. They might have got more, but it cannot be said on the proof that there was no risk of their getting less. Even the capital of the legacies could not have been recovered without an expensive and troublesome litigation, the result of which must have been very doubtful.

"The case, therefore, as it appears to me upon the evidence, is not one of an unexpected surplus accruing in the hands of a trustee who, in order to facilitate a winding-up, and the payment of legacies, has agreed to buy the trust-estate. It would be very difficult to hold that a trustee could plead a discharge obtained in this way as entitling him to put in his own pocket, free from the obligations of the trust, an unexpected and unlooked for asset of the trust, or one which by some unforeseen accident proved to be of large value, instead of being of no value at all. That is not the kind of case, however, which is presented here. The case here is one where some of the assets no doubt appear to have yielded more than was expected, but where others yielded less; where some of the claims against the estate have not yet been established, but where others have turned out heavier or of longer continuance than was calculated. The proof does not shew distinctly on which side the balance will ultimately be.

"On the whole, I am of opinion that even as against the trustees of Mr Alexander Jopp, into whose hands the whole remaining trust-estates appear to have come, no right to set aside the transaction belonged to Mr or Mrs Walker at the time of their death. Mr Walker survived his wife Mary Leith, and died in 1872. His wife died in 1871, and after her death her children, including the pursuer Mrs Buckner, obtained payment of the capital sum of the legacy which she liferented, and the amount of which had been made up and

but the rule was an absolute one that a trustee could not put himself into such a position as would make his individual interests conflict with his duty to the trust, and could not make a profit to himself out of the trust.¹ Even if the rule were not absolute, the circumstances here warranted its application, for a very large profit had been made, with almost no risk, the estate having been realised in three or four years without Abercrombie having been called on to pay almost anything, and this profit had been made without any consideration having been given for the chance of making it. Certainly the next of kin had got nothing, and it was sufficiently obvious that the main motive of the transaction was as Mr M'Kinnon put it, to get Jopp out of the "scrape" of mixing up trust-funds with his own private speculations. It was out of the question that Jopp should be allowed thus to profit by his own misconduct. It was true that the pursuers were represented by a law-agent, Mr M'Kinnon, who had recommended the arrangement as the best in the whole circumstances; and the most formidable answer to the pursuers' demand was that they were precluded from setting aside the transaction, although unconscionable, because in entering into it they had been represented by a lawyer. That answer was unsound.² The disability of trustees to transact on their personal account with the estate was absolute. At least the trustees here were certainly so disabled, for assuming that independent legal advice might in certain circumstances be an answer, what the trustee making that answer had to shew was that the beneficiary had in point of fact had independent legal advice, and here Mr M'Kinnon's advice was not independent, inasmuch as it did not proceed on independent information as to the value of the estate obtained by Mr M'Kinnon himself. He had taken his information on trust from Jopp and Lindsay, Jopp's accountant. The plea of mora was bad. Mere lapse of time was insufficient. There must be positive proof of intention to confirm the invalid deed after the relation creating the invalidity had terminated.³ Here there was no such proof.

No. 178.

July 16, 1887.

Buckner v.
Jopp's Trustees.

settled in the way provided by the deed under reduction. But I am not prepared to say that the discharge which they granted for that sum precludes them from maintaining the present action, or involved any personal homologation by them of the transaction entered into by their parents. The question is, I think, whether John Walker, as in right jure mariti of any claim possessed by his wife Mary Leith, as one of Mr Lumsden's next of kin, was possessed at the time of his death of a right to set aside the transaction, or must be held to have confirmed it. This question I answer in the way already indicated.

"If I am right in holding that John Walker could not have set aside the transaction as against Mr Alexander Jopp, who was a trustee as well as one of the law-agents of the trust, it follows a fortiori that no such claim could have been maintained against the firm of Jopp & Shand, or against the other trustees, who were only concerned in the transaction as concurring with their co-trustee Mr Jopp."

¹ Aberdeen Railway Co. v. Blaikie, July 20, 1854, 17 D. (H. L.) 20, 1 Macq. 461, 26 Scot. Jur. 622; Hamilton v. Wright, March 2, 1842, 1 Bell's App. 574; York Building Co. v. Mackenzie, May 13, 1795, 3 Pat. App. 378; Vaughton v. Noble, May 23, 1861, 30 Beav. 34; Snell's Eq. 574.

² M'Pherson's Trustees v. Watt, Dec. 3, 1877, 5 R. (H. L.) 9, per Lord O'Hagan at p. 17; Logan's Trustees v. Reid, June 13, 1885, 12 R. 1094, per Lord Craighill at p. 1100.

³ Seath v. Taylor, Jan. 21, 1848, 10 D. 377, 20 Scot. Jur. 128; Cunninghame v. Boswell, May 29, 1868, 6 Macph. 890, per Lord Cowan, p. 895; Mackenzie v. Catton's Trustees, Dec. 14, 1879, 5 R. 313, per Lord Deas, 317; C B v. A B, March 5, 1885, 12 R. (H. L.) 36.

No. 178.

July 16, 1887.
Buckner v.
Jopp's Trustees.

Argued for the defenders;—The present was not a case of a conveyance of the trust-estate by the trustees to themselves as individuals—except technically as a mere matter of conveyancing—but a conveyance by the beneficiaries to the trustees; and a transaction of this latter sort at least was not void but voidable merely in the option of the beneficiaries if the trustees could not shew that the transaction was a fair one in the circumstances. The onus was on the trustees to shew that.¹ This option the beneficiaries might exercise either expressly or rebus ipsis et factis. Here the evidence established that in the opinion of all concerned at the time the transaction was an advantageous one for the beneficiaries, and a correspondingly disadvantageous one for the trustees, who took over the trust-estate, and the interest of the heir-at-law and the next of kin therein, not because they or anyone else at the time thought any profit was to be made out of it, but merely to save questions afterwards with the heir-at-law or the next of kin. So much was this the case, that while the trustees wished to resile from the arrangement, they were obliged to adhere to it under threat of legal proceedings. Then the evidence further shewed that the pursuers' authors were represented by a competent law-agent, who undoubtedly gave the matter his complete attention, as both his parole evidence and his books shewed. The case, in short, was in effect indistinguishable from the compromise of an action by beneficiaries against trustees on account of their maladministration, and nothing short of absolute fraud would be sufficient to warrant that being set aside. Then there was the long delay of thirty-five years in raising the action. That was not pleaded by the defenders as amounting to the extinction of a debt by mora, but rather as shewing that the beneficiaries had exercised their option, though not expressly, of declining to challenge a voidable transaction.

At advising.—

LORD JUSTICE-CLERK.—This case has caused very considerable anxiety to myself, and I believe to your Lordships also. The action, into the details of which I have no intention of entering, is at the instance of the representatives of one of the legatees and next of kin of Harry Leith Lumsden, a gentleman who died in 1844. The defenders are the representatives of the trustees under his settlement. The settlement is a detailed and somewhat complex instrument. In addition to the heritable estate it left a considerable amount of legacies to special legatees, and the residue fell as intestate succession to the testator's next of kin.

The allegation upon which the pursuers bring the action is that in 1851 and 1852, the trustees, or rather one of their number, Mr Jopp of Aberdeen, concluded an agreement with the beneficiaries under the settlement by which on the one hand provision was made for the immediate payment of the legacies, and on the other hand the residuary legatees handed over their whole rights in the residue substantially to Mr Jopp himself. The pursuers say that that itself on the face of it was a breach of trust—that a trustee has no right to acquire the estate of the trust even by an agreement of that kind, and that although a long time has elapsed since the transaction took place, they are still entitled to challenge it

¹ Fraser v. Hankey, Jan. 13, 1847, 9 D. 415, 19 Soot. Jur. 164; Luff v. Lord, Dec. 2, 1864, 34 Beav. 220, aff. 1 White & Tudor, 141; Coles v. Beclerick, Jan. 27, 1864, 9 Vesey, 234, per Lord Eldon, 246; Morse v. Royal, March 8, 1806, 12 Vesey, 355, per Lord Erskine, p. 373; M'Laren on Wills, p. 352; Lewin on Trusts, p. 487.

In point of fact they contend that the arrangement was not one for the furtherance of the trust purposes, but that after all the trust purposes had been fully completed the trustee made profit out of the residue which had been conveyed to him.

No. 178.

July 18, 1887.
Buckner v.
Jepp's Trustees.

The case thus made is, I must say, a sufficiently serious one. I have myself gone carefully over the proof and examined the agreement in question, and I am bound to say that upon the face of that agreement I think it raises the gravest possible question in regard to the duties and powers of trustees under such a settlement. As a general rule a trustee cannot acquire any part of the trust-estate for himself. The Dean of Faculty in his very powerful speech argued that this agreement after all involved no more than what happens when a trustee is found to have made a bad investment and to be liable to replace it. I think no cases can be more different. When a trustee is obliged to take over a security which he has improperly accepted on behalf of beneficiaries he restores to the estate what he improperly invested. But here, without any consideration to the residuary legatees so far as we can see on the face of the instrument—in return for the obligation to pay the specific legacies to the legatees—the trustee takes over what is substantially the whole of the residue for himself. I must own that if the transaction had been challenged within a reasonable time after it took place—I should have thought that the recipient of the residue—being himself one of the trustees under the deed, was at all events put upon his vindication. I do not go further than that, but I think he would have been put upon his vindication. On the face of it I am of opinion that the agreement discloses a transaction that was beyond his power. I will not say that in all cases beneficiaries and trustees may not bargain with each other, provided it be clear beyond all doubt that it is with a view to the benefit of the beneficiaries and of the trust-estate. I think, however, that that must be shewn by the trustee. I am further of opinion that the cases are very exceptional in which such bargaining would be allowed, and therefore although I am not prepared to lay down as an abstract proposition that in no case can a trustee interpose his own personal credit or become himself the purchaser of the trust-estate, I would put it that where he does so he must justify his action.

Now, this is a very singular transaction. It may have an explanation, but I must say that the explanation does not appear on the face of it. It is said that the legatees had become clamorous for their legacies, that the estate took a long time to wind up, that there was no ready-money to pay the legacies for which the legatees had become clamorous, and that therefore it was desirable that there should be some settlement come to by which payment could be made of the sums due to the legatees whatever might otherwise become of or be produced by the residue. That may be the nature of the case, but it is very insufficiently shewn in the proof. The legatees were impatient because seven years had elapsed since the death of the testator, and it seems to me that they were not unnaturally anxious for the payment of their money. There were questions also in regard to the personal liability of the trustee, and I daresay it was not unreasonable that they should have entertained doubts on the information they had, or on the representations made to them, regarding the financial stability of that gentleman. That might have given an aspect to the whole arrangement very far from favourable to the trustee, but upon that I do not think it is necessary to elaborate. I have made these remarks because I should be sorry to be understood to say that it is a light or trivial matter to make an arrangement of this

No. 178. kind. On the contrary, as I have already said, I think it calls for vindication. As far as the proof has gone I am not satisfied that any vindication has been established, but then what of that when we come to consider the lapse of time! Five-and-thirty years have elapsed since all this was done. The parties entered into the arrangement with full information and with full advice. They acted under the advice of a very able man of business. They were all of them consulted, and they all agreed to it. Therefore, while I say that the apparent aspect of the arrangement does require vindication, I do not on the other hand think there is any excuse for the parties having lain by for thirty-five years and allowed all the information that might have been available to be lost. Most of the parties are now dead, and no explanation can now be given by them upon a great many vital and important questions. It might have been otherwise but for that long delay. I will not say that five-and-thirty years would in all circumstances be a bar to an action of this kind, but seeing that the whole question depends on the nature and legality of the transaction itself, I am not in the meantime to pass any judgment in regard to the length of time which might be any such action. These are the general views I entertain of the case, and they are sufficient in my opinion to lead me to affirm the judgment of the Lord Ordinary.

July 16, 1887.
Buckner v.
Jopp's Trustees.

LORD YOUNG.—I concur in the result, and generally in the grounds which your Lordship has stated for reaching that result.

The deed sought to be set aside is a deed of discharge and assignation, dated so long ago as the year 1852. It was acted upon at the time and stood unchallenged until the year 1886—thirty-four years after its date, and long after it had been fully acted upon. Of course if that deed was subject to a legal objection the mere lapse of time would not bar the reduction of it. By being subject to a legal objection, I mean that had it been invalid ab initio it might be challenged within the period of the long prescription, and upon certain grounds even after that. But here it is not challenged upon any ground of that kind. It was the result of a transaction between testamentary trustees and beneficiaries who were dissatisfied with the conduct of those testamentary trustees. That was the nature of the transaction. The testator died in 1844, and in 1852 the legatees had got payment of only one-half of their legacies, and the residuary legatees had got nothing at all. They were not unnaturally dissatisfied, therefore, with the conduct of the testamentary trustees. It is pretty hard, I must own, to understand how it came about that what was understood to be a considerable estate had been so managed that only a half of the legacies was paid ten years after the testator's death. However, that collision between the dissatisfied beneficiaries and the trustees led to an arrangement. On both sides the parties were represented by men of business. The trustees themselves were men of business, that is to say, Mr Jopp was a member of a firm of law-agents in Aberdeen—Messrs Jopp & Shand, and the dissatisfied beneficiaries had the advice and assistance of Mr Mackinnon, a most respectable man of business. Well, the beneficiaries being dissatisfied with the trustees, and demanding what the trustees said they could not give, but what the beneficiaries thought they were entitled to, the position really amounted to this, that they must either come to a settlement or fight the matter out in a Court of law. It is generally the more prudent course to come to a settlement, and I should not say that there was prima facie anything wrong in a settlement between dissatisfied beneficiaries and trustees.

tees who are declaring their inability to give what the beneficiaries are demanding. If any fraud was practised on the one side or the other, and if that fraud was detected after the lapse of thirty-five or even forty years, I think the transaction might be set aside; but it could not at the time, any more than it could now, have been set aside merely because it was an amicable arrangement between dissatisfied beneficiaries and trustees. After they had come to terms, with the assistance of men of business on both sides, something occurred which induced the trustees to draw back from the arrangement which they had made. They said—"We have ascertained facts that make this a most imprudent arrangement for us, and we wish to be off as we have still locus penitentiae." The answer to that was—"No, we hold you bound, and unless you implement your engagement to settle, we will bring you into Court." The trustees then said—"Rather than that, we will carry out the arrangement, and you can have your settlement." But suppose that the trustees had declined to adhere to the arrangement and gone into Court, and that the beneficiaries, being sui juris, had got judgment enforcing the arrangement, such judgment could not have been set aside unless it was proved that there was fraud in the case. But they did not require the authority of the Court in any such matter as that. They were entitled to enter into an arrangement which they thought was obviously for the benefit of the beneficiaries.

The feature which gives interest and difficulty to this case is that which your Lordship has noticed, namely, that the settlement involved the purchase and acquisition of the trust-estate administered by these trustees. The acquisition by trustees of the trust-estate under their control has always been regarded by the Court with the greatest jealousy, and if it appears that the trustees have made a profit out of it, it will not be difficult, as a general rule, for the beneficiary, coming timeously into Court to have it set aside; although even if such challenge is timeously made the trustee would according to law, as I understand it, uphold an arrangement with the beneficiaries upon satisfying the Court that they had been quite fairly dealt with and had full information in regard to everything; and the case would be all the stronger if, besides having full information, the beneficiaries being sui juris desired the bargain which was made betwixt them and the trustees, the trustees taking no advantage of the position of the beneficiaries. That is all that the Court requires, and the burden of shewing that would be on the trustees, in order to uphold such a transaction betwixt them and beneficiaries sui juris. I quite agree that if the beneficiaries could have come forward at the time and said—"Well, we were misled into it; we did not understand the case as the trustees did. They had knowledge and we had not, and the result is that they are making a large sum of money, or a considerable sum of money, at our expense"—in that case I think—not upon mere rules of ordinary law, but upon equitable considerations which are indeed a part of our ordinary common law, and administered as such—we would or might have given relief. But when the beneficiaries, sui juris, who made the arrangement and threatened reluctant trustees with an action to enforce it if they would not sign the deed giving complete effect to the arrangement—I say when these beneficiaries take implement of the agreement and stand by it for thirty-five years—I should require a very special case indeed to be stated in order to induce me even to inquire into the transaction, and I agree with your Lordship that such a case is not proved here.

I desire to add that in my opinion, after the best consideration I have been

No. 178.

July 16, 1887.
Buckner v.
Jopp's Trustees.

able to give to the case, such a case as I have figured in these last sentences is not stated in this record. After carefully reading and considering the case, I should have been satisfied with a judgment assailing the defenders from the conclusions of the action upon the ground that no relevant grounds for reduction of this deed have been stated. I think that after five-and-thirty years it is too late to appeal to those equitable considerations which induce the Court to make minute inquiry as to the whole circumstances of a transaction between trustees and beneficiaries. There is equity and manifest good sense in that view. The original parties are all dead, and what the present defenders are called upon to do is to defend as quite fair the action of people who have been dead for many years by shewing that they acted fairly, and communicated to all parties all that they themselves knew.

As I have said, I agree in the result, and generally in the grounds for the result, which your Lordship has stated.

LORD CRAIGHILL.—I also think that the defenders are entitled to be assailed. My reasons for this opinion are those which have been explained by Lord Young. With him I doubt whether there is a relevant case set forth in the record. I doubt whether even if this action had been brought long before the present time, so far as anything appears in the record, judgment must not necessarily have been given in favour of the defenders. But it is an overwhelming consideration that the action has not been raised till the lapse of five-and-thirty years after the date of the arrangement which has been challenged. If such an action had been timeously raised it would necessarily have involved minute inquiry, and now that such a delay has taken place it is impossible to get the information which would then have been available.

LORD RUTHERFURD CLARK concurred.

THE COURT pronounced this interlocutor:—"Refuse the reclaiming note, and adhere to the interlocutor reclaimed against: Find the defenders entitled to additional expenses: Remit," &c.

WILLIAM OFFICER, S.S.C.—H. B. & F. J. DEWAR, W.S.—Agents.

No. 179. ROBERT THOMSON AND OTHERS, Pursuers (Reclaimers).—D.-F. Mackintosh—Walton.

July 19, 1887.
Thomson v.
Anderson.

HENRY ANDERSON AND ANOTHER, Defenders (Respondents).—Gloag—Low.
THE SYNOD OF THE UNITED ORIGINAL SECESSION CHURCH AND OTHERS, Petitioners.—D.-F. Mackintosh—Walton.

HENRY ANDERSON AND OTHERS, Respondents.—Gloag—Low.

Church—Dissenting Church—Trust—Cy près.—Part of a congregation connected with the United Original Secession Church separated from that church with their minister, and formed a new congregation. In 1871 the congregation bought a place of worship, and a minister's house, taking the title in favour of certain members of the congregation, and such other persons as might thereafter be appointed by male members of the congregation, on condition that any trustee or member leaving the congregation and "worshipping elsewhere not in harmony with the principles contained in the Testimony (United Original Secession)," should be disqualified from acting or voting. In consequence of the minister falling into bad health the church was closed in 1878, and the trustees were authorised to sell the church. The church was not sold, but the premises were let and the rents applied in reduction of debt.

In 1886 a petition was presented by the Synod of the United Original Seceders, with the concurrence and consent of four persons describing themselves as members of the congregation "at the time of its dissolution," against the two surviving trustees, praying the Court to ordain the trustees to pay over the trust-funds, and to convey the trust property to the petitioners for behoof of certain funds of the Synod, or to pay and convey the same for such purposes as the Court should deem most in accordance with the purposes of the trust, on the ground that the purposes of the trust had failed. No. 179.

July 19, 1887.
Thomson v. Anderson.

The trustees, in answer, stated that the rents of the buildings were being applied in reduction of the debt, and that when the debt was extinguished they hoped to get a new minister. Held that it had not been proved that the purposes of the trust had failed, and petition dismissed.

IN 1857 a congregation of the United Original Secession Church worshipped in a church in Adam Square, Edinburgh, under the pastoral charge of the Rev. Archibald Brown. The church was held by trustees for the use and behoof of the congregation, or of those members thereof who adhered to the principles of the Testimony.* In 1857 a difference arose between Mr Brown and the Synod, the supreme Court of the Church, on the subject of Sunday schools, he conceiving that the Synod had deviated to some extent from the Testimony on that matter. In consequence of some language used by him in this controversy, which he refused to retract, he was suspended by the Synod, who proceeded to direct another minister to declare the church in Adam Square vacant, but Mr Brown and that part of his congregation which agreed with him would not allow this to be done. That part of the congregation which agreed with the Synod then formed a new congregation of Original Seceders in Victoria Terrace, while Mr Brown and those who agreed with him remained in occupation of the church in Adam Square. In 1867 the Victoria Terrace congregation, for a payment of £50, renounced all right to the Adam Square buildings, and delivered up the titles to the congregation in possession. 2D DIVISION.
Lord Lea.
B.

In 1870 the Edinburgh Improvement Commissioners acquired the church in Adam Square. The congregation then purchased and fitted up as a new church and manse for Mr Brown, with the money obtained from the Improvement Commissioners, a hall and house in South Clerk Street. The title was taken to and in favour of "Charles Lyon, Thomas Dickson, Henry Anderson, and Charles Frater Lyon, and the survivors and survivor of them, and to such other person or persons as may be named by the male members of the congregation at a general meeting called for that purpose by intimation from the precentor's desk on the Sabbath before such meeting, as trustees and managers for the congregation of the United Original Seceders presently worshipping in Adam Square under the pastoral charge of the Reverend Archibald Brown, any three of said trustees, while more than three survive, and the majority while three only survive, being a quorum, and any four being a quorum of a meeting of the male members of the congregation, and under the condition that any trustee or member of the congregation leaving it and worshipping elsewhere not in harmony with the principles contained in the Testimony (United Original Secession), shall thereby be disqualified from acting as a trustee under this present conveyance, and from voting at meetings, or of having any say in the affairs of the congregation, and to the assignees and disponees whom-

* The principles of the religious body known as United Original Seceders are contained in a Testimony dated in 1842, which is substantially that drawn up in 1739 by those who formed a Secession Church after the Secession in 1733. Among other principles of the Testimony it is held that it is the duty of parents to give instruction to their children in the doctrine and duties of religion, and if they fail that the duty falls upon the minister and elders alone, and cannot be delegated to others not office-bearers of the church. Sunday schools taught by those not office-bearers of the church are therefore included among the "practical evils" enumerated by the Testimony.

No. 179.
 July 19, 1887.
 Thomson v.
 Anderson.

soever of the said trustees, heritably and irredeemably." Divine service continued to be observed till in consequence of Mr Brown's failing health, in 1876, he became unable to officiate, and prayer meetings were thereafter conducted by the elders. On 29th July 1878 a meeting of male members of the congregation was held, and it was resolved that the trustees should have power to sell the church and house, and to invest the proceeds "in such way and for such terms and for such period as they may deem proper." The parties to this action were at variance as to whether it was also resolved to dissolve the congregation, but the minute of meeting which was produced contained no such agreement. At the date when service ceased to be held there were in all, male and female, about fourteen members of the congregation. The property was once exposed, but did not sell. In the spring of 1879 Mr Brown died. No further service was held in the church, which, with the house, was let to another body. The trustees applied the rents in removing a debt upon the property.

In October 1886, an action was brought by Robert Thomson and his wife, and James Sinton and his wife, members of Mr Brown's congregation, against Henry Anderson and George Frater Lyon (also members of it) as only surviving trustees and managers for the congregation, for declarator that the church and house were held by them in trust for behoof of the pursuers and other remanent members of the congregation, for an accounting of their intromissions as trustees and managers with the subjects and the rents, and also for a decree ordaining them to convey the subjects and the rent and revenues of them "to the ministers and elders forming the kirk-session of the church of United Original Seceders in Victoria Terrace, Edinburgh, under the pastoral charge of the Rev. John Sturrock, in trust for behoof of the congregation of said church of United Original Seceders in Victoria Terrace, Edinburgh, or to the Synod of the United Original Secession denomination, or to such other persons, or for such other purposes, as our said Lords may consider most in accordance with the purposes of the said trust-disposition."

The four pursuers averred that the congregation had been finally dissolved; that they, after its dissolution, had joined the congregation in Victoria Terrace, which, they alleged, maintained the Testimony in all points; that of the members of the congregation at its dissolution in 1878 several were either dead or removed from Edinburgh, while the defender Lyon now attended the Free Church, and Anderson attended a church of Original Seceders, who were not United Original Seceders, in Lauriston Street.

The pursuers pleaded;—(1) The defenders, as trustees for the congregation of which the pursuers were members at the time of its dissolution, are bound to account for their intromissions as concluded for in the summons. (2) The defenders, as trustees foresaid, are bound to convey the trust properties and pay over the trust-funds in terms of one or other of the alternative conclusions of the summons.

The defenders denied that the congregation was ever dissolved, stated that they still hoped to get a minister for it, that the proposed sale was not necessary after Mr Brown's death, because the sole object of it was to provide funds for his sustenance, and that the pursuers by joining the Victoria Terrace congregation, which the defenders averred did not adhere to the Testimony in sundry particulars, had deprived themselves of the right of having any say in the affairs of the congregation.

The defenders pleaded;—(1) No title to sue. (2) The pursuers being a minority of the congregation to whom the property belonged, and, separatim, having joined a congregation which is not in harmony with the principles contained in the Testimony of the United Original Seceders, have no right or power to control the disposal of the said property. (3)

The defenders should be assoilzied, in respect that a majority of the surviving members and adherents of the congregation to whom the property belonged desire that it should be held by the defenders with the view of obtaining another minister and resuming public worship in the said church. (4) The trust under which the said property is held by the defenders, being solely a trust for the congregation, the pursuers are not entitled to decree that it should be made over to the Synod.

The Lord Ordinary (Lee) found "that the pursuers have set forth no sufficient title to sue the present action." *

No. 179.

July 19, 1887.
Thomson v.
Anderson.

* "OPINION.—The pursuers are four persons who at one time (prior to October 1878) belonged to the congregation of Original Seceders, formerly worshipping in Adam Square under the pastoral charge of the Rev. Archibald Brown. In 1871, when the Adam Square Church was taken by the Improvement Trustees, that congregation acquired the subjects in Clerk Street described in the summons, the title being taken to 'Charles Lyon,' &c. [quoted supra].

"In July 1878 the church was closed in consequence of the illness of Mr Brown (who died in 1879); and the congregation, at a meeting of the male members, empowered the trustees to expose the church and house for sale, and to invest the proceeds 'in such way and for such terms and for such period as they may deem proper.' The subjects, however, did not find a purchaser. They are still in the hands of the surviving trustees, Mr Henry Anderson and Mr Charles Frater Lyon, who are the defenders in this action.

"The pursuers ask for decree of declarator that the subjects 'are held by the said defenders in trust for behoof of the pursuers and other remanent members of the said congregation of United Original Seceders'; further, for an account of the defender's intromissions, and also that the defenders should be decerned to convey the subjects, and to make payment of the rents, revenues, and others, 'to the minister and elders forming the kirk-session of the church of United Original Seceders in Victoria Terrace, Edinburgh, under the pastoral charge of the Reverend John Sturrock, in trust for behoof of the congregation of said church' (viz, the Victoria Terrace church), 'or to the Synod of the United Original Secession denomination; or to such other persons, or for such other purposes, as our said Lords may consider most in accordance with the purposes of the said trust-disposition.'

"The first question raised by the defences is, whether the pursuers have set forth any sufficient title to sue the present action? Have they, upon the averments made on record, any right or interest, under the titles to the property, by virtue of which they can insist in the conclusions or any of them?

"It is substantially settled by the case of Couper v. Burn (22 D. 129), where the terms of the title were very similar, that the trust created by such a title as here occurs is a trust for the congregation therein described, and not for the ecclesiastical body with which that congregation was in connection, nor for any different congregation in connection with that body. I did not understand this to be disputed; and the leading conclusion of the summons seems to assume that the title was of this character, and vested the beneficial interest in the members of a certain congregation.

"In this view of the title, if the action had arisen out of a split in the congregation, it might have been necessary, in order to dispose of competing claims to the property, to ascertain which party adhered to the principles upon which the congregation was formed.

"But the peculiarity of this case is that it has not originated in any alleged deviation on the part of the defenders from the principles of the Secession Testimony, or in any threatened misappropriation of the subjects to the use of a different body from that which is described in the title as the congregation of United Original Seceders worshipping in Adam Square. The defenders do not dispute that they hold the subjects in trust for that congregation. The sole ground of action is that the congregation has been dissolved. It would not seem to follow, even if the fact were so, that the property is to be taken out of the hands of the trustees. But, at all events, it is incumbent on those who make

No. 179. The pursuers reclaimed, and before the reclaiming note was heard the Synod of Original Seceders, with consent and concurrence of the pursuers, such a demand to shew that they possess a title and interest to vindicate the claims which they bring forward.

July 19, 1887.
Thomson v.
Anderson.

"With regard to the conclusions as directed to a conveyance of the property to the kirk-session of the Victoria Terrace congregation, or otherwise to the United Original Secession denomination, it appears to me that the pursuers' title is manifestly insufficient. Neither of these bodies is a party to the action; and the pursuers have not alleged any title to represent either the one or the other.

"Then how stands the pursuers' title to vindicate the property for the congregation formerly worshipping in Adam Square under the pastoral charge of Mr Brown?

"They do not profess now to belong to that congregation; for they admit that in October 1878 they became members of the Victoria Terrace congregation. That is not merely a different congregation, having a distinct organisation and separate existence, but it was so at the time when the Clerk Street subjects were bought, and the title taken as above set forth. Indeed, that congregation was formed in 1857, by a portion of Mr Brown's congregation, which separated itself from him upon grounds of difference which are not said to have afforded any pretence for depriving Mr Brown and his adherents of the right to the old church in Adam Square. It seems unnecessary, for the purpose of considering the pursuers' title to represent the congregation referred to in the title, to inquire minutely into the nature and origin of these differences. They were sufficient, in the view of the Victoria Terrace congregation, which the pursuers have joined, to justify a secession from Mr Brown and his congregation. The pursuers' statement is (in cond. 2), 'As a result of these dissensions, about half of the members of the Adam Square congregation seceded from it, and formed the congregation of United Original Seceders now meeting in Victoria Terrace, Edinburgh. Mr Brown's adherents remained with him, and kept possession of the church in Adam Square.' It is admitted, in answer to the defenders' statement of facts (art. 2), that in 1867 the titles of the Adam Square subjects were delivered up to the Adam Square congregation, and that a sum of £50 was then paid by them to the Victoria Terrace congregation, apparently for a renunciation of all claims to the church. It was after this that the Adam Square church was taken by the Improvement Trustees, and that the subjects in Clerk Street were acquired.

"I am of opinion that the circumstances set forth and admitted by the pursuers preclude them from claiming any connection with the congregation referred to in the title by which these subjects are held, and that they have no title to maintain any of the conclusions of the present action.

"Another question, however, has been raised, upon which I should wish to guard myself from being supposed to give any opinion. The pursuers allege that in 1878 the Clerk Street church was finally closed, and that Mr Brown's congregation was then dissolved. That may have been the result of the proceedings which then took place, though the defenders deny it, and plead that they are bound to hold the subjects, or the price obtained for them, in the hope of getting a minister for the congregation in room of Mr Brown, and of thus being able to carry out the trust according to its terms. But whether this be so or not is a question which, in my opinion, need not be decided in the present action. If an application should be made to the nobile officium of the Court upon the ground that the trust has failed, that matter will be duly considered. But in the meantime the property is in the hands of the survivors of the original trustees, who are not said to be making away with it, or to be otherwise than responsible persons. The allegations as to their having become disqualified by attendance at other churches, such as the Original Seceders' Church in Lauriston Street, or the Free Church, appear to me insufficient to warrant the intervention of the pursuers, at least in this form of action. The congregation is admittedly in a state of suspended animation, and the church is admittedly closed in the presented a petition to the Inner-House, craving the Court in the exercise of its nobile officium, in respect it had become impossible, in consequence of the dissolution of the congregation, to carry out the trust in the original manner, to direct the funds consisting of the property and its rents to be placed at the disposal of the Synod of the Original Secession Church for its mutual assistance fund, its home mission fund, and its business and hall fund, or one or more of them.*

No. 179.

July 19, 1887.
Thomson v.
Anderson.

Answers were lodged, in which the respondents, who were joined in their answers by several members of the congregation, took up the same position as in their defences.

The reclaiming note and petition were heard together, and the respondents being willing to produce accounts the Court, after hearing counsel, before answer, appointed the accounts to be produced. This was done, and the accounts shewed that there was a debt on the property which the respondents were paying off, and which would be paid off in four years or thereby. The petitioners did not offer any objection to the accuracy of these accounts.

Argued for the pursuers and petitioners;—It was clear on the admitted facts that the congregation was dissolved, and could not be resuscitated. It was idle to expect that when the debt was paid off a new minister would be got and a congregation formed. The pursuers were the only original members except the trustees, and the cause of the separation from the main body was a personal dispute between Mr Brown, who was now dead, and the main body of the Secession. It was impossible to execute the trust in the original manner, and the circumstances called for the application of the doctrine known as approximation or cy près.¹ It was said that there was no title to sue. But there was here an interest in a trust which the Court were bound to protect, and to do so by treating the trust as a charitable trust, and applying the funds to the maintenance of the testimony of the Secession Church. The case was one—(1) of trust, (2) of charitable trust, (3) of a failure in a charitable trust, the purpose of which could be fulfilled by an application of the funds to similar objects but with somewhat different machinery. The proposals of the petition for the application of it were consistent with the purpose of the trust, and they or such proposals were within the powers of the Court, and should be adopted.

Argued for the defenders (respondents in petition);—The question was not one of the law of trusts, but of patrimonial right. This was not a charity for which a scheme could be settled, because a donor's meantime. So long as this is the case by an act to which the pursuers themselves were parties, the disqualifying clause cannot be fairly applied to the trustees merely in respect of their attendance at another church, and the pursuers can take no benefit from the fact of such attendance. The utmost that the pursuers can claim, in any view, is a right to see that the property is not misapplied; and I give no opinion against their title to make an application to the Court in the exercise of its nobile officium."

* By the first of those funds small stipends were supplemented, by the second missionary work was carried on in towns, and by the third professors' salaries were paid, weak congregations aided, and travelling expenses of ministers who supplied vacant congregations were paid.

¹ Clephane v. Magistrates of Edinburgh, Feb. 26, 1869, 1 Macq. 417 (Lord Westbury), 7 Macph. (H. L.) 7, 41 Scot. Jur. 306; M'Culloch v. Kirk-Session and Heritors of Dalry, July 20, 1876, 1182; Grant v. Macqueen, May 23, 1877, 4 R. 734 (Rothiemurchus case); Attorney-General v. Bunce, April 22, 1867, 6 L. R. Eq. 563; Stephens' Commentaries, iii. 80; Boyle's Law of Charities, 149; Jarman on Wills, i. 246, et seq.

No. 179.

July 19, 1887.
Thomson v.
Anderson.

charitable intention was likely to fail for want of machinery to carry it out. It was a case in which people had subscribed funds and bought a piece of property for a particular purpose, and in such a case the Court would not treat the funds as if these were a donation which required a scheme for its management.¹ It was truly a question in the law of contract, not in the law of trusts.² In these cases of property bought for a congregation of Dissenters the true view, of which there were several examples in Scotland, was that the property was held not for the synodical body, but for the congregation holding the particular tenets.³ The title in Couper v. Burn was very analogous to the title in the present case. The trust, if trust there was, was for a continuing body, its present and future members. Now, here there might soon be future members entitled to use this property along with those still remaining, for it was contemplated to carry on the regular services of the congregation and get a new minister whenever the debt was paid off. It was shewn by the accounts, which were not criticised on the other side, that in four years the debt would be paid off, and this could be done. It would be time enough then for the Court to consider such a petition. In the Rothiemurchus case the Court let the matter stand over as was here proposed. The Dalry case (supra) was truly a question whether certain trustees had acted ultra vires. It was no authority for the petitioners. Even if the question were one in the law of trusts, the Court would not interfere, because it was not a case for cy près, which only applied where there was a general charitable purpose, while here the only purpose was the benefit of a particular congregation which might still be resuscitated.⁴ The schemes proposed were in no view similar to the objects of the original subscribers.

At advising,—

LORD JUSTICE-CLERK.—In this action and relative petition I am of opinion that the pursuers and petitioners have not shewn sufficient ground for our interference in present circumstances. Of the two proceedings the first is the action at the instance of certain parties who state that they are the members of this congregation. The other is an appeal to the nobile officium of the Court on behalf of the Synod of Original Seceders. The cause of the proceedings is simply this. In 1857 the minister of a congregation of Original Seceders who worshipped in Adam Square—Mr Brown—had a difference with the general body of Original Seceders. The result was that after some discussion of the difference the Synod suspended him. A large part of the congregation adhered to their minister, and they occupied the church from 1857 till 1870, when the church in Adam Square was taken by the Improvement Commissioners, the price being paid to the congregation which had remained in possession of the church.

With the money so obtained Mr Brown and the congregation bought the church now in dispute, taking the title to trustees for the congregation worshipping under Mr Brown. It was substantially a trust for the congregation, and was a valid title. The identity of the congregation being once ascertained,

¹ Mitchell v. Burness, June 19, 1878, 5 R. 954.

² Bain v. Black, Feb. 22, 1849, 6 Bell's Ap. 317.

³ Craigie v. Marshall, Jan. 25, 1850, 12 D. 523 (see per Lord Moncreiff, p. 541); Couper v. Burn, Dec. 2, 1859, 22 D. 120, 32 Scot. Jur. 46; and see Perth Hospital case, May 20, 1795; Bell's Folio Cases, 173.

⁴ Att.-Gen. v. Oglander, 1790, 3 Brown's Ch. Ca. 166, 18 Beavan (Lord Romilly); Clark v. Taylor, July 7, 1853 (Kindersley, V.-C.), 1 Drewry, 642.

the title is a good title for its behoof. Mr Brown became ill in 1876, and died No. 179. in 1879.

Now, I should have mentioned that at the time of the small disruption to which I have alluded certain members of the congregation formed another congregation in Victoria Terrace. By the time of Mr Brown's death there had been for more than two years no regular service in the church which those remaining with him attended, though there had been prayer meetings and Bible readings. After his death the existing trustees let the church and house for a rent, and from 1878 till now that has been the position of affairs, and the defenders in the action are two original trustees. The congregation has long disappeared, but there still remain, according to the defenders, fourteen of the members. How many have gone to other sects we do not know. Meantime there is a certain debt on the church and house, and these two trustees are, it is said, paying it off, and still hope when it is paid off to form a congregation again. In these circumstances the Synod of the Original Secession Church, together with four members of the congregation, came forward to assert that the purpose of the trust has failed, and that they have sufficient title to have the accounts produced (which has been done), and to invoke the interposition of the Court, as being the persons most near to those for whom the original trust was intended, and they ask us to find that the property of the congregation ought to be applied for the benefit of the denomination as the purpose nearest to that of the original trust. In the end we may be obliged to do that, but as matters stand at present I am of opinion that the purpose of the trust has not failed. The petitioners were, I think, entitled to call for the accounts, which are regular and correct, and shew that the trustees are going on paying off the debt. The original purpose may yet be subserved in the future, therefore in the meantime it would be premature to express an opinion, and I therefore say nothing further on the question whether the Original Secession Synod has a title, or the members of the church have a title, to set up a new trust. A question of difficulty may be there involved. Meantime it is enough to say that there is no such failure, either of the title or of the trust, as to induce us to sustain the contention of the pursuers and petitioners.

LORD YOUNG.—I am of the same opinion. The action is one of declarator and accounting, and concludes also for a decree to ordain the defenders to hand over the trust property to the Rev. John Sturrock and others in trust for certain purposes specified. In that action the trustees of the fund have exhibited accounts which I have examined, and which are simple and complete, and shew that the trustees are paying off the debt. They debit themselves with the rent received, and credit themselves with the local taxes and expenses and interest of debt. I think, too, that the pursuers are satisfied with these accounts, for they have said nothing against them. I do not think a process of count and reckoning was necessary to get these accounts.

As to the declarator that the church and house are held in trust according to the title, I think that too was quite unnecessary. I do not think, indeed, that there is any case for our interference, either under the ordinary action or under the petition. The church was acquired by the congregation worshipping in it under the pastoral care of the Rev. Archibald Brown. He did not keep his congregation together, and died, and the remnant of it disappeared, and the church was no longer used. The church and the house in which he had lived

July 19, 1887.
Thomson v.
Anderson.

No. 179.
 July 19, 1887.
 Thomson v.
 Anderson.

were the trust property, and as they were unoccupied, and there was a debt on them, what were the trustees to do? Plainly they were bound to make as much as they could of them to meet their obligations. Neither the church nor the house could then be used for the purposes for which they were originally intended, for there was no congregation and no minister. The trustees therefore let both, and there is no suggestion that in so doing they did not act in the discharge of their duty. There was no violation of it, no misapplication of the property. A time may come when we must inquire if they are to sell the property and apply the price in some particular way, but there is no occasion to consider that now on the statement of these two members of the congregation and their wives, or the Synod of the Original Secession Church. I think they have made out no case for our interference. Had there appeared to be any misappropriation or misapplication of that property, we should have restrained that, but there is none, and I think that the action should be dismissed, with expenses to the defenders, who are entirely in the right, and that the petition should also be dismissed, with expenses.

LORD CRAIGHILL and LORD RUTHERFURD CLARK concurred.

In the action the Court pronounced this interlocutor:—"Refuse the reclaiming note, and adhere to the interlocutor reclaimed against: Find the defenders entitled to expenses."

In the petition the Court pronounced this interlocutor:—"Dismiss the petition: Find the respondents entitled to expenses."

THOMAS WHITE, S.S.C.—RONALD & RITCHIE, S.S.C.—Agents.

No. 180.
 July 19, 1887.
 Byars' Trustees v. Hay.

GEORGE PATON ALEXANDER AND ANOTHER (James Byars' Trustees), First Parties.—Pearson—Law.

JANE BYARS HAY, Second Party.—Pearson—Law.

CHARLES KEITH, Third Party.—Gloag—Kennedy.

Succession—Vesting—Destination over.—A truster directed his trustees to retain a share of the residue of his estate and invest the same in their own names for behoof of the children nominatim of his brother "equally between and among them in liferent and their lawful issues, born and to be born, equally among them in fee." In the event of the death of a child, payment was not to be made to his issue until the youngest attained majority. There was further a declaration that in the event of any of such issue "dying before the period fixed for division of their shares respectively leaving lawful issue, such issue shall come in place of the parent, and take and receive what the parent would have been entitled to if then in life." Held that the clause first above quoted imported an absolute gift to the issue of the children of the testator's brother, and that the subsequent clauses did not control the absolute character of that gift, and consequently that the fee of the shares vested in the issue of these children a morte testatoris.

2D DIVISION.
 M.

JAMES BYARS, Cherrybank, Forfar, died unmarried on 8th April 1867, leaving a trust-disposition and settlement dated 28th January 1867, by which he disposed his whole estate, heritable and moveable, to trustees. After directing payment of his debts, the truster, in the second place, appointed his trustees "to divide the free residue and remainder of my estate so soon as they find it expedient into two equal shares, which I direct and appoint them to dispose of as follows, viz.: One share thereof to be retained by my said trustees and invested by them in their own names for behoof of the children of my said brother, Andrew Byars, viz., Robert Byars, David Byars, Jessie Byars or Simpson, and Margaret Byars or Hay, equally between and among them in liferent, and their lawful issues, born and to be born, equally among them in fee, and that per stirpes and not per capita, the half of my estate being thus destined or divided into four equal shares, one whereof shall descend to the said Robert Byars in liferent, and his lawful issue in fee, another to the said David Byars in liferent, and his lawful issue in fee, another to the said Jessie Byars or Simpson in liferent, and her lawful issue in fee, and the remaining share to the said Margaret Byars or Hay in liferent, and her lawful issue in fee ;

. . . Declaring, as it is hereby provided and declared, with reference to the share or half of my said estate destined to the children of my said brother, Andrew Byars, in liferent, and to their lawful issues, equally among them in fee as aforesaid, that, in the event of any of the said Robert Byars, David Byars, Jessie Byars or Simpson, and Margaret Byars or Hay, dying before his or her youngest child attaining the age of twenty-one years, the shares of the half of my said estate, respectively liferented by the said Robert Byars, David Byars, Jessie Byars or Simpson, and Margaret Byars or Hay, shall not be payable to their children to whom they are destined in fee, until the youngest lawful child of any of the said Robert Byars, David Byars, Jessie Byars or Simpson, and Margaret Byars or Hay, so dying, shall have attained the age of twenty-one years, but on the youngest child of the family of any of them so dying attaining that age, my said trustees shall be bound to pay to and amongst that family the share above provided to them . . . And in the event of any of the said Robert Byars, David Byars, Jessie Byars or Simpson, and Margaret Byars or Hay, dying before the youngest of his or her family attaining the age of twenty-one years complete, then I authorise and empower my said trustees to pay or disburse for the board, education, and maintenance of such family, such sum or sums of money as they, my said trustees, may think proper, out of the interest, revenue, and profits, arising from the share destined in fee for that family : with power also to my said trustees to advance to any of the members of such family, out of the principal of the share falling to such family, such sums of money to account of his or her share of my means and estate as my trustees may resolve upon, for their education and maintenance, or for forwarding them in business or otherwise advancing their prospects in life, and that before the period appointed for division, and with regard to any surplus or reversion of the interests, revenues, and profits, arising upon each of the said shares after deduction of all expenses and necessary outgoings in connection with the same, and all payments made therefrom in terms of this deed, I direct and appoint that the same be accumulated along with the principal sum or share, and divided in the same way and manner as the said share itself.

. . . Declaring further, as it is hereby further provided and declared, that, in the event of any of the children of the said Robert Byars, David Byars, Jessie Byars or Simpson, and Margaret Byars or Hay, dying before the said period fixed for division of their shares respectively, leaving lawful issue, such issue shall come in place of the parent and take and receive what the parent would have been entitled to, if then in life."

Robert Byars, David Byars, Jessie Byars or Simpson, and Margaret Byars or Hay, survived the testator. Margaret Byars or Hay had by her first marriage one child, Jane Byars Hay, born on 17th May 1866. Robert Hay, her first husband, died prior to the date of the said trust-disposition and settlement, viz., on 1st June 1866. She subsequently married Charles Keith, and by him had two children, Robert Wilson Keith, and James Simpson Keith, both of whom died in infancy, although the younger survived his mother for a few months. She herself died on 11th November 1877.

No. 180.

July 19, 1887.
Byars' Trustees v. Hay.

No. 180.

July 19, 1887.
Byars' Trustees v. Hay.

Jane Byars Hay, the only surviving child of Margaret Byars or Hay, having attained the age of twenty-one on 17th May 1887, a special case was presented to determine to whom fell the share of residue left to the issue of her mother. James Byars' trustees were the first parties, Jane Byars Hay was the second party, and Charles Keith, her stepfather, was the third party. The total amount of the share in question was £830, 18s.

The second party maintained that no right or interest under the trust-disposition and settlement vested in her or the other children of Margaret Byars or Hay until the period of distribution mentioned in the deed, viz., when the youngest child of Margaret Byars or Hay attained the age of twenty-one years, and that the brothers uterine of the second party, Robert Wilson Keith and James Simpson Keith, having died without issue, she, as the only surviving child of her mother, was entitled to the whole £830, 18s.

The third party maintained that vesting took place in the children of his late wife, Margaret Byars or Hay, a morte testatoris, or at least at the birth of each child, and that one-third share of the one-eighth share of the residue liferented by their mother was vested in each of his two children, Robert Wilson Keith and James Simpson Keith, prior to the dates of their respective deaths, and that he, as their father and next of kin, was entitled, on being confirmed executor to them, to receive payment of the shares so vested in them respectively.

The questions of law were:—“(1) Is the second party entitled to the whole of the said sum of £830, 18s.? or (2) Is the third party, on confirming as aforesaid, entitled to receive two one-third shares of the said sum of £830, 18s., or any portion thereof?”¹

At advising,—

LORD RUTHERFURD CLARK.—The question in this special case is, whether a certain legacy left by the settlement of the late James Byars vested a morte testatoris, or did not vest until the period of distribution mentioned in the deed, namely, when the youngest child of Mrs Hay attained the age of twenty-one? After a consideration of all the clauses in the deed, I have come to be of opinion that the legacy vested a morte testatoris, and therefore that we are bound to answer the second question in favour of the third parties.

By the clause in the trust-deed with which we have to deal the trustor directs that after his death his estate shall be divided into two equal shares, and regarding one share the direction is as follows:—“One share thereof to be retained by my said trustees and invested by them in their own names for behoof of the children of my said brother Andrew Byars, viz., Robert Byars, David Byars, Jessie Byars or Simpson, and Margaret Byars or Hay, equally between and among them in liferent, and their lawful issues, born or to be born, equally among them in fee, and that per stirpes and not per capita, the half of my estate being thus destined or divided into four equal shares, one whereof shall descend to the said Robert Byars in liferent and his lawful issue in fee, another to the said David Byars in liferent and his lawful issue in fee, another to the said Jessie Byars or Simpson in liferent and her lawful issue in fee, and the remaining share to the said Margaret Byars or Hay in liferent and her lawful issue in fee." Now, there is thus created in the most distinct manner rights of liferent and of fee in Margaret Byars and her children respectively, and of course if there is nothing in the rest of the deed to control this clause there can be no doubt that the issue of Margaret took a right to the fee a morte testatoris, but it is said that there are certain later clauses in the deed which qualify this right, and shew it to have been the intention of the truster to postpone vesting. But I take leave to say with respect to these clauses that they do not postpone the gift—they do not relate to the gift at all—they relate entirely to the period of division or payment. The first of these clauses declares,—“As it is hereby provided and declared, with reference to the share or half of my said estate destined to the children of my said brother Andrew Byars, in liferent, and to their lawful issues equally among them in fee as aforesaid, that in the event of any of the said Robert Byars, David Byars, Jessie Byars or Simpson, and Margaret Byars or Hay, dying before his or her youngest child attaining the age of twenty-one years, the shares of the half of my said estate, respectively liferented by the said Robert Byars, David Byars, Jessie Byars or Simpson, and Margaret Byars or Hay, shall not be payable to their children, to whom they are destined in fee, until the youngest lawful child of any of the said Robert Byars, David Byars, Jessie Byars or Simpson, and Margaret Byars or Hay, so dying, shall have attained the age of twenty-one years.” Even here there is no clause providing for any survivorship or destination over, but there is a clause further on which is said to introduce that element. That clause provides—“In the event of any of the children of the said Robert Byars, David Byars, Jessie Byars or Simpson, and Margaret Byars or Hay, dying before the said period fixed for division of their shares respectively, leaving lawful issue, such issue shall come in place of the parent, and take and receive what the parent would have been entitled to if then in life.” That is the clause which creates the only difficulty which this deed presents, and I do not say that it does not occasion some difficulty. But in the first place, as I have said, it is a clause which is applicable to the period of division, and does not affect the words by which the gift is conveyed in the first instance. The words of gift confer an absolute fee on the objects of the gift, and do so at once, and I confess I would require very strong and unequivocal language indeed before I could accept it as detracting from the absolute nature of the gift, and say that not an absolute but only a conditional fee is given. In the second place, I think it has been commonly said with respect to such a clause, which merely substitutes children for their parents, that it has very little effect on the question of vesting, as being merely an expression of what the law itself would imply. In the next place, I should be inclined to say that this clause may possibly be referable to the division of the estate which the testator directed to be made immediately after his death, but if not to that, then that it is a clause which provides for the divestiture of the beneficiaries if in point of fact the case should happen which would make such divestiture necessary. That case does not occur here, and therefore I have no occasion to consider the

¹ Authorities (cited by the second party).—Laing v. Barclay, July 20, 1865, 5 Macph. 1143, per Lord Kinloch, p. 1147; Taylor v. Gilbert's Trustees, Nov. 3, 1877, 5 R. 49, rev. July 12, 1878, 5 R. (H. L.) 217, L. R., 3 App. Cas. 1287; Waters' Trustees v. Waters, Dec. 6, 1884, 12 R. 253. (Cited by third party).—Wallace, Jan. 28, 1868, M. voce Clause, App. No. 6; Miller v. Finlay's Trustees, Feb. 25, 1875, 2 R. (H. L.) 1; Jackson v. M'Millan, March 18, 1876, 3 R. 627; Wilson's Trustees v. Quick, Feb. 28, 1878, 5 R. 697; Snell's Trustees v. Morrison, March 20, 1877, 4 R. 709; Lindsay's Trustees v. Lindsay, Dec. 14, 1880, 8 R. 281; Fraser v. Fraser's Trustees, Nov. 27, 1883, 11 R. 196; Ross' Trustees, Dec. 18, 1884, 12 R. 378; Peacock's Trustees v. Peacock, March 20, 1885, 12 R. 878.

No. 180.

July 19, 1887.

Byars' Trustees v. Hay.

No. 180. clause further. I have only to consider it with reference to the question, at what period did the shares vest?

July 19, 1887.
Byars' Trustees v. Hay.

The view therefore which, on the whole, I am inclined to take is this: I find that by a very express clause the fee of the capital is given to certain persons—the children of Margaret Byars; that that fee is given without qualification or condition; and creating as it does a right in these beneficiaries at the moment of the trustor's death, I do not see that that right has been taken away or in any way limited by what occurs in the subsequent parts of the deed so as to make one prefer a later period of vesting to that which is the natural or presumed period of vesting, namely, the death of the trustor.

LORD CRAIGHILL and the LORD JUSTICE-CLERK concurred.

LORD YOUNG was absent.

THE COURT pronounced this interlocutor:—"Answer the first of the questions therein stated in the negative, and the second in the affirmative: Find and declare accordingly: Find neither of the parties entitled to expenses, and decern."

MACRAE, FLETT, & RENNIE, W.S.—ROBERT FINLAY, S.S.C.—Agents.

No. 181.

July 19, 1887.
M'Kercher v.
M'Quarrie.

REV. PETER M'KERCHER, Pursuer (Appellant).—Rhind.
ALEXANDER M'QUARRIE, Defender (Respondent).—M'Kechrie.

Expenses—Counsel in Sheriff Court—A. S., 4th December 1878.

2ND DIVISION.
I.

IN an action in the Sheriff Court of Argyllshire at Inveraray, at the instance of the Rev. Peter M'Kercher, parish minister of Kilmore and Kilbride, against Alexander M'Quarrie, baker, Loch Awe, near Dalmally, both parties appeared by counsel at the proof and debate thereon. The Sheriff-substitute (Campion) having assoilized the defender, with expenses, the pursuer appealed to the Court of Session. The Court affirmed the judgment, and remitted the defender's account of expenses to the Auditor. At the taxation on 8th July 1887 the Auditor disallowed charges in the account for instructing counsel in the Sheriff Court, because no application had been made to the Sheriff-substitute while the case was in the Sheriff Court, either for authority to employ counsel, or for approval of their employment. After the taxation the agent for the defender presented to the Auditor a certificate by the Sheriff-substitute, dated 7th July 1887, stating that counsel were employed with his approval. The Auditor was of opinion that the certificate was too late, in respect it was not applied for till after the action had been finally decided in the Sheriff Court, and been appealed to the Supreme Court and there decided. He reported the point to the Court. The "Table of Fees for General Business in Sheriff Courts," fixed by A. S., 4th December 1878 (for regulating the fees of agents practising in Sheriff Courts), provides for charges for "instructing counsel where the employment of counsel is authorised or subsequently sanctioned."

The Court found "that the sum mentioned falls to be added to the amount of the defender's expenses as taxed and reported upon by the Auditor," and quoad ultra approved of the report.

W. OFFICER, S.S.C.—W. B. GLEN, S.S.C.—Agents.

MICHAEL M'QUADE, Pursuer (Appellant).—A. S. D. Thomson.
 WILLIAM DIXON, LIMITED, Defenders (Respondents).—Jameson.

No. 182.

July 19, 1887.

Reparation—Master and Servant—Employers Liability Act, 1880 (43 and 44 Vict. c. 42), sec. 1—Defect in condition of way.—In an action brought by a miner against his employer for damages at common law or under the Employers Liability Act, the pursuer averred that when attending a horse in the mine he was knocked down by it, and that he was seriously injured by falling on a sleeper with a nail protruding from it, which had been left on the roadway through the fault of the roadsman. Held that there was no relevant averment that the road was in a defective condition, or that the accident was caused by the fault of the defender.

M'Quade v. Wm. Dixon, Limited.

MICHAEL M'QUADE who had for some time prior to 5th February 1885 been in the employment of William Dixon, Limited, as a pony driver in a colliery at Blantyre, brought this action against them in the Sheriff Court of Lanarkshire, averring that on that day he had brought his horse for water to a trough in the pit, that while the horse was standing there "the bottomer pulled down the gates and the noise startled the horse, so that it wheeled round and knocked the pursuer down. He fell on a sleeper which had been left lying on the road unknown to him, and in this sleeper there was a large spike nail which penetrated the pursuer's right knee." He then set forth that his leg had required to be amputated, that in consequence he had been permanently injured, and that the accident was caused through the fault and negligence of the defenders, or of their oversman, roadsman, and bottomer, for each and all of whose faults or negligence the defenders were responsible under the Employers Liability Act, 1880. "It was the duty of the roadsman to see that the road was perfectly clear and safe. Had he been attending to his duty the sleeper on which pursuer was thrown ought not to have been there. The bottomer also, knowing that horses were close to him, ought to have given warning before he shut the gates down, so that the pursuer might have been prepared to see that his horse remained steady. Besides it was the duty of the oversman to see that the said roadsman discharged his duties, and the oversman was aware of the sleeper being placed on said road, and of the danger in consequence to anyone using said road."

2nd DIVISION.
 Sheriff of Lanarkshire.
 I.

The pursuer pleaded;—(1) The pursuer having suffered loss, injury, and damage through the fault or negligence of the defenders, or of those for whom they are responsible, is entitled to reparation therefor. (2) The defenders being bound to keep the roads clear of all obstructions, and having failed to do so, are liable to the pursuer in damages. (3) Or otherwise, the pursuer having been injured while in the employment of the defenders as a workman through the fault or negligence of the defenders, or of those for whom they are responsible, are liable to the pursuer in damages, and decree should be pronounced in terms of the second conclusion of the petition, under the "Employers Liability Act, 1880," section 1, subsections 1, 2, and 3.*

* The Employers Liability Act, 1880 (43 and 44 Vict. c. 42), enacts, sec. 1,—"Where, after the commencement of this Act, personal injury is caused to a workman (1) by reason of any defect in the condition of the ways, works, machinery, or plant connected with or used in the business of the employer, . . . the workman, or, in case the injury results in death, the legal personal representatives of the workman, and any persons entitled in case of death, shall have the same right of compensation and remedies against the employer as if the workman had not been a workman of, nor in the service of, the employer, nor engaged in his work."

Sec. 2.—"A workman shall not be entitled under this Act to any right of

No. 182.

July 19, 1887.
M'Quade v.
Wm. Dixon,
Limited.

The defenders pleaded that the action was irrelevant.

The Sheriff (Spens) before answer allowed a proof.

The pursuer appealed for jury trial, and proposed an issue for the trial of the cause.

The defenders argued that the action was irrelevant. The proximate cause of the accident was that the horse started because a gate slammed, but there was no fault in the bottomer in letting it shut. The fact that a gate had been allowed to swing to, and so caused an accident, did not infer fault.¹ The mere fact that a sleeper was allowed to lie at the roadside out of the way of ordinary traffic till it should be removed for repair in due course, was not a defect in the condition of a way in the sense of the Employers Liability Act.

Argued for the pursuer;—The bottomer should not have carelessly allowed the gate to slam, and frightened a horse which he had reason to know was close to him. But, in any view, the fact that a sleeper with a projecting nail was left on the roadway was a defect in the condition of the way which was due to the negligence of the roadman.²

LOED JUSTICE-CLERK.—These cases are often troublesome, and sometimes painful, as this is. The pursuer, through no fault of his, was so injured that his leg had to be amputated. The result would, I think, probably command itself to the sympathy of his employers.

But the question we have now to consider is a question entirely of the relevancy of the statement here. I am of opinion it is not relevant. Apparently the nature of the occurrence was that the pursuer was leading a horse along a passage of the mine close to one of the gates, the trough to which he was leading the horse being beside the gate which shut off the shaft from the coal-work. The horse was startled by the falling of the gate, which in the course of the working of the pit was allowed to shut, and he backed against the pursuer, who fell upon the roadway. It happened that a sleeper was lying on the road, and there was a spike in it which entered the knee of the pursuer. The first question is, Is there any liability arising from the bottomer letting the gate fall which it is said startled the horse? If there is no liability on that ground, then is the master, under the Employers Act, responsible because this piece of sleeper was put alongside the wall, or was put upon the roadway, against which or on which the man fell and thereby got that very serious injury?

Now, as to the first question, I am quite satisfied that it was a contingency for which nobody was responsible, for the bottomer was only doing his duty in letting the gate fall. He did not expect the horse to be startled, and neither did the driver of the horse. It was startled, and thereupon the event happened, for which, in my view, no blame is attributable to any of the persons concerned. The unfortunate man was knocked over by the horse backing, and he fell upon this bit of wood, and the spike entered his knee. My opinion is that the injury compensation or remedy against the employer in any of the following cases—that is to say, (1) under sub-section 1 of section 1, unless the defect therein mentioned arose from or had not been discovered or remedied owing to the negligence of the employer, or of a person in his employment, and entrusted by him with the duty of seeing that the ways, works, machinery, or plant were in proper condition."

¹ Mitchell v. Pattullo, Dec. 9, 1885, 23 S. L. R. 207.

² Mitchell v. Coats Iron Co., Nov. 6, 1885, 23 S. L. R. 108.

arose from a misadventure for which nobody is responsible. It may be said, No. 182. no doubt, that somebody was responsible for placing the sleeper where it was, but nobody could possibly have expected that this man could be knocked over by a horse in the way he was, and besides, the sleeper was laid down in a place where it could be found again in conducting the operations of the mine. From all of which I draw simply the conclusion that it is an unfortunate misadventure, to which persons are always liable, and that it would be a straining of the law of liability to an extravagant extent to make the master liable for an accident—as it may be properly called—of this kind. I am of opinion that there is no relevant matter on the record.

July 19, 1887.
M'Quade v.
Wm. Dixon,
Limited.

LORD YOUNG.—I am of the same opinion. I sympathise very much with the observation that your Lordship made, that as the pursuer here met with an accident in consequence of which he lost his leg, without any blame on his part, while in the defenders' service, the defender might well make him some compensation. I hope that that may be considered even now.

But upon the relevancy of this record, as a ground of action on the footing that the master was to blame, or that some other was to blame for whom the master is responsible under the Employers Liability Act, I entirely agree. I think no blame is imputable to the master, or to anyone for whom the master is responsible, for the shutting of the gate, whereby the horse was startled and knocked the pursuer down. There was no neglect of the duties of an ordinarily good master, neither was there any fault on the part of anyone for whom he was responsible under the Employers Liability Act, 1880. Then it is said that the fall would have been harmless had the sleeper with a nail protruding from it not been lying on the roadway. That was a calamity; but the question is, whether it was the master's fault that the sleeper with the nail in it was there? It was certainly not directly his fault. He did not fail in anything he did, nor in employing fit servants, but it is said that he is responsible because the overman who picked up the broken sleeper should have taken it away, and not simply put it aside. Well, the effect of the Act is that a master is to be responsible to the person injured although he is his workman, and though the injury was done by a fellow-workman, just as if he had been not a workman but a stranger lawfully on the premises. In short, he is not to be entitled to plead the law which he could plead before, that a master is not responsible to one servant for the fault of another. I take the case so, and as there are few strangers who could be said to be lawfully on the roadway of a mine, I take the case of an ordinary road leading to a man's house or farm. The owner or someone else has, I will suppose, picked up something lying on the road, and placed it on one side. A stranger passing along is thrown from his horse, and striking against this thing, picked up the minute before, is much hurt by it. Is there any liability ex culpa to the stranger? It is one of the things which happen in the ordinary course of life that such a thing found impeding the road should be put on one side, and it does not occur to me that any such action would lie. Since, therefore, I do not think that in such a case there would be any liability to a stranger—and we are to deal with the case as if it happened to a stranger—I think the action irrelevant. I may add that I do not like sending a case of this kind to a jury unless there is a distinctly relevant case set out on record, since there would be a risk of their taking the view that this poor man had lost his leg, and that his employers, who were well able to pay, should just have to pay for it.

No. 182.

July 19, 1887.
M'Quade v.
Wm. Dixon,
Limited.

LORD CRAIGHILL.—I agree with your Lordship and Lord Young. It does not appear to me that in any reasonable view of the facts of the case fault is ascribable to the defenders or to anyone in the defenders' employment. In regard to what really led up to the accident—I mean the letting down of the gates—it is quite plain that no fault is imputable to the person whose duty it was to let down the gates, which was quite a common operation in the mine, and therefore one which had been performed repeatedly, and, so far as we know, without any accident ever having occurred. That being so, it is impossible to conclude that there could have been any expectation of its startling the horse upon this occasion in question. What was done was done in the ordinary course of the working of the pit.

With regard to the other alleged ground of liability—I mean the placing of the sleeper in the position in which it caused injury to this man—I also think that the pursuer has failed to set forth a relevant case. I do not think the person who picked it up was in fault in placing it where it was found, even although there was a spike in it. The sleeper was to be replaced. There was no need to take it away. It was only put aside in order that it might be repaired and then replaced. It was reasonable to put it where it was, and but for the unfortunate startling of the horse nothing but convenience could have resulted from putting it where it was. There was certainly no recklessness nor want of due care or consideration for anybody in putting it where it was. When the oversman, whose duty it was to see that the road was clear, went his rounds he saw where the sleeper was lying, and the conclusion was a just one to which he came—that the sleeper was placed there for the purpose of convenience, and that it would be reinstated in its former position when the proper time arrived. I cannot therefore impute fault upon that ground. The most plausible view urged against the defenders upon this part of the case is, "Oh, this is a defect in the road." Now, I do not think there was any defect by reason of the presence of the sleeper that contributed to the occurrence of this accident. There was no obstruction in the road whether in going one way or in going another. Anybody could pass where it was without the least obstacle. The sleeper presented nothing like obstruction. It is a trite remark to say that the unexpected is the thing that does occur; but I do not infer from the occurrence of this accident and the serious consequence to this man that in any reasonable sense, even if he had gone upon the theory of the unexpected happening, that fault could be imputed to the man who placed the sleeper in that position. Therefore, in my opinion, there is no defect here covered by the sections of the statute upon which Mr Thomson rested his case. There was no obstruction of the road by reason of the sleeper being placed where it was. It was placed there, having regard to its ordinary use, and, as I have said, with the view of its speedy replacement. On the whole matter, therefore, I agree with your Lordships.

LORD RUTHERFURD CLARK.—I am of the same opinion. I think to make a relevant case the pursuer ought to have been much more distinct in his averments.

THE COURT found that "the facts alleged by the pursuer are not relevant to support the conclusions of the action: Therefore dismiss the action, and decern."

ROBERT WISEMAN (Scott's Trustee), Pursuer (Respondent).—Darling— No. 183.
W. C. Smith.

WILLIAM SCOTT JUNIOR AND CURATOR AD LITEM, Defender (Reclaimers).—July 19, 1887.
Gloag—Kennedy. Scott's Trustee v. Scott.

Tutor—Ultra vires.—A bond granted by a tutor over his ward's heritable estate is null.

Bankruptcy—Recompense—Improvements on a pupil's estate by his father without authority.—A pupil having succeeded to heritage, his father, as his administrator-in-law, proceeded to execute improvements on it, and borrowed money for the purpose, granting, "as tutor-at-law," a bond and disposition in security primarily over the pupil's lands, and secondarily and collaterally over lands belonging to himself, declaring that in the event of his making payment he should be entitled to relief from the pupil's lands and the proprietor thereof. The bond narrated the purpose to which the loan was to be applied. The father having become bankrupt some years afterwards, the trustee upon his sequestrated estate paid up the loan, taking an assignation to the security, including the right of relief, and then sued the son for £500, the amount to which it was admitted he was lucratus by his father's expenditure. The son pleaded that he was entitled to set off the rents of his estate (amounting to £310), which were in his father's hands at the date of the sequestration unaccounted for, against the £500.

Held that the bond was invalid quoad the pupil, and that the only obligation upon him was to recompense his father for the sum beneficially expended by him upon the estate, and that this was a debt due to the father at the date of his sequestration against which the pupil was entitled to set the rents then due to him by his father (dict. Lord Shand, who held that the history of the transaction shewed that the true creditor in the improvement expenditure was the granter of the loan, and that the pursuer having obtained an assignation thereto after the sequestration was entitled to full payment of the £500, leaving the son to rank as a creditor on his father's estate for the rents).

WILLIAM SCOTT junior, who was born on 18th July 1870, succeeded, 1st Division.
 on the death of his mother in 1874, to the lands of Summerhouse, Lord M'Laren.
 Stirlingshire, extending to 102 acres. Mrs Scott was not infeft in the B.
 lands, and consequently her surviving husband, William Scott senior, had no right of courtesy therein.

Certain improvements being necessary in the view of William Scott senior, as his son's administrator-in-law, he borrowed a sum of £1500 in 1879 in order to carry them out. The lender was Mr Matthew Cleland, merchant, Cambusnethan.

In security of the loan Scott senior granted Cleland a bond and disposition in security, which was in the following terms, as narrated in article 3 of the pursuer's condescendence in the present action*:—(Cond. 3) "By the said bond and disposition in security, which proceeds on the narrative that the said William Scott had deemed it right to borrow the said sum with a view to the improvement of the said lands, and for the purpose of defraying the expense of erecting a suitable steading thereon, the said William Scott, therein described as 'merchant in Strathaven, in the county of Lanark, tutor-at-law to my son, William Scott jun.,' inter alia, granted him, as tutor-at-law foresaid, to have instantly borrowed and received from Matthew Cleland, merchant, Cambusnethan, in the county of Lanark, the sum of £1500 sterling, which sum he bound the said William Scott junior, and himself as tutor-at-law foresaid, and also him-

* The bond was not printed, but both parties admitted that its terms were correctly set forth in the condescendence.

No. 183.

July 19, 1887.
 Scott's Trustee
 v. Scott.

self as an individual, and their respective heirs, executors, and representatives whomsoever, without the necessity of discussing them in their order, to repay to the said Matthew Cleland and his heirs, executors, or assignees whomsoever, at the term of Whitsunday 1879, within the Sheriff-clerk's office in Glasgow, and in security of the personal obligation therein before written, in the first place, he, as tutor-at-law foresaid, disposed to and in favour of the said Matthew Cleland and his forebears, heritably but redeemably as thereafter mentioned, yet irredeemably in the event of a sale by virtue thereof, All and Whole the said lands of Summerhouse, therein particularly described; and, in the second place, he, for himself, disposed to and in favour of the said Matthew Cleland and his forebears, heritably but redeemably, as thereafter mentioned, yet irredeemably in the event of a sale by virtue thereof, All and Hail these six and eight penny lands of Graynes, in the parish of Avondale and county of Lanark, therein particularly described, belonging to the said William Scott himself; and whereas the said sum of money had been borrowed only for the purpose of making the said improvements on the said lands of Summerhouse, and was intended by him to form a charge thereupon, and upon his said son as proprietor thereof, and his personal obligation therefor had only been granted, and the said lands of Graynes had only been disposed as an additional security to the said Matthew Cleland, therefore the said William Scott did thereby declare that the said sum should be and was thereby constituted primarily a burden upon the said lands of Summerhouse and proprietor thereof, and only secondarily a burden upon the said lands of Graynes, and proprietor thereof, and that in the event of himself or his successors in the said lands of Graynes paying the said sum, or interest thereon, they should be entitled to relief from the said lands of Summerhouse and proprietor thereof, and for the purpose of operating such relief, they should, if they requested it, be entitled to an assignation of the said bond and disposition in security from the said Matthew Cleland (said assignation bearing, however, warrantice from fact and deed only), declaring, however, that the said provision should not be held in any way to limit the right of the said Matthew Cleland, in the event of failure to pay the said principal sum, interest, or consequences, to operate against all or any of the subjects thereby disposed without discussing them in the above order."

The estates of William Scott senior were sequestrated in February 1885, and Robert Wiseman was appointed trustee. The present action was shortly thereafter brought by the trustee against William Scott junior and Cleland. The summons (as amended before the Lord Ordinary's interlocutor was pronounced) concluded for declarator that the sum of £1500 contained in the bond, or such other sum as should be ascertained, "was properly expended by the said William Scott in improving the said lands of Summerhouse belonging to the defender William Scott junior; and that the said expenditure did to the extent of £1500, or such other sum aforesaid, permanently improve the said lands as at the date of said bond and disposition in security; and that the defender William Scott junior was thereby lucratus to the extent aforesaid, and that to the extent aforesaid the pursuer is entitled to require the defender Matthew Cleland, being the creditor in said bond and disposition in security, to proceed thereunder in the first place against the said William Scott junior and his estate, and that to the extent aforesaid the said William Scott junior is bound to free and relieve the pursuer, as trustee foresaid, and the said William Scott and his estate, of all obligations undertaken by the said William Scott in said bond and disposition in security, and of all sums paid by the said William Scott or the pursuer to the creditor in said bond and disposition in security"; and for declarator that the bond and disposition in security formed a good and valid security over the lands of Summerhouse for the £1500, or at least to the extent to which the defender William Scott junior was lucratus by the expenditure thereof. There was added a conclusion against William Scott junior for payment of the £1500, or of so much of it as had been paid by the pursuer to Cleland in discharge of the bond and disposition in security.

No. 183.

July 19, 1887.
Scott's Trust-
tee v. Scott.

The pursuer averred;—(Cond. 4) "The said William Scott proceeded to expend the money so obtained in improving the said lands of Summerhouse, and particularly in the erection of a steading and in fencing and draining. The steading (including house) was appropriate to the size of the farm. The said lands have been greatly improved in value by the said expenditure, which was absolutely necessary for the proper cultivation thereof, and the defender William Scott junior, as proprietor thereof, is lucratus by the said expenditure to the full extent of the sum borrowed, or, at all events, to the extent of £1152, 13s. 2d. The rent of the said lands in 1874 was £57, and this rent could not have been maintained if the expenditure had not been made, but in 1878 the lands were let on a lease for nineteen years at a rent of £85, rising in 1886 to £105 per annum." This further averment was afterwards added,—“Since the date of closing this record the pursuer has paid the sum of £1500 contained in said bond and disposition in security to the said Matthew Cleland, and has obtained from him an assignation to said bond and disposition in security, dated 11th November 1885, which is produced and referred to.”

The defender William Scott junior (to whom a curator ad litem was appointed) alone appeared to defend the action. He denied that the bond and disposition in security in any way bound him, or that his father had had any authority to enter into the transaction, he having been a pupil at the time. He further averred,—“Explained that this defender's father was solvent at and for a considerable time after the execution of the said bond, and that he has drawn the whole rents of this defender's lands since the succession opened in 1874, amounting to £750 or thereby. He has never accounted to this defender, but it is believed and averred that he received rents and other funds, belonging to the estate of this defender, more than sufficient to extinguish the amount to which this defender's estate was increased in value by the expenditure on his lands, and this would be made to appear on a proper balancing of accounts between them. These funds were not kept separate and distinct from his proper individual estate. At least this defender is not liable to make payment of the amount by which it may be held that the value of his estate was increased as aforesaid except under deduction, pro tanto, of the sums so due to him by his father's estate.”

The pursuer's pleas as amended, inter alia, were;—(2) The money borrowed under the said bond and disposition in security having been expended on the lands of Summerhouse, belonging to the defender, William Scott junior, and the said expenditure having been necessary and reasonable, the pursuer is entitled to decree that the said bond forms a good and valid security over the said lands, at all events to the extent to which the said defender is lucratus thereby. (3) The defender, William Scott junior, being lucratus by the said expenditure, and the obligations undertaken in said bond and disposition in security by the said William Scott and his estate being those of a cautioner only, the pursuer is entitled to the other decrees of declarator concluded for. (4) The pursuer, having paid the sums contained in the said bond and disposition in

No. 183.

July 19, 1887.
 Scott's Trustee
 v. Scott.

security, is entitled to decree for payment thereof to the extent to which the defender, W. Scott jr., was lucratus thereby.

The defender pleaded, inter alia;—(3) The said bond and disposition in security not having been executed by this defender, or anyone authorised to borrow money on the security of his heritage, does not form a good and valid security over the lands of this defender, and he ought to be assoilzied, with expenses. (4) The said transaction not having been reasonable and necessary in the administration of this defender's estate, this defender ought to be assoilzied, with expenses. (5) As the claim now made in respect of this defender having been lucratus by the expenditure libelled on has been extinguished, this defender ought to be assoilzied, or, at least, the pursuer is not entitled to have the said claim sustained except to the extent of the balance ascertained to be due by this defender to his father's estate.

To obviate proof, a joint minute was put in for the parties in which they stated that they had agreed "(first), that the expenditure referred to in condescendence 4 of the record, by this defender's father, William Scott senior, should be held as having improved this defender's lands of Summerhouse in value (both at the date of said expenditure and at the present time) to the extent of £500; (second), that the said expenditure, but only to the extent of the said £500, and interest thereon at £4 per centum per annum, from the 15th day of May 1879, forms a proper item of charge against the estate of this defender, in the accounting between this defender and the estate of his said father, William Scott senior; and (third), that the balance due by this defender upon an accounting between him and the pursuer, as trustee upon the sequestrated estate of the said William Scott, amounts to the sum of £190 sterling as at the date hereof, and they accordingly craved the Lord Ordinary to pronounce an interlocutor disposing of the cause, and to find neither party liable in expenses."

The Lord Ordinary (M'Laren), on 26th February 1887, pronounced this interlocutor:—"Finds that Matthew Cleland, therein designed, advanced to the minor defender, William Scott junior, £1500 on the receipt and obligation of the minor's father, and that to the extent of £500 the estate of the minor is permanently improved and increased in value by the expenditure of a part of said advanced money upon it, and that to this extent the said William Scott junior is liable in repayment of the said advance: Finds that the pursuer has acquired, by assignation, the right of the creditor in said advance, and that said right is not subject to compensation by any claim arising on the accounts between the said William Scott junior and his father, the bankrupt: Therefore decerns against the said William Scott junior for payment of the said sum of £500, with interest thereon at the rate of 5 per centum per annum from the date of citation until payment, but that only upon the pursuer executing and delivering to the defender, the said William Scott junior, a valid and sufficient discharge of the said bond and disposition in security, in so far as the same binds, or purports to bind, the said William Scott junior, and his said lands of Summerhouse: Finds no expenses due." *

* "OPINION.—I think I am now fully in possession of the facts of the case, and the views that have been respectively maintained. The question here relates to the extent to which it is possible to render the estate of a minor liable for money expended in its improvement. In the circumstances set forth in the condescendence, the pupil's father resolved to execute improvements on his son's estate, for which he borrowed in the son's name the sum of £1500 from Matthew Cleland. But in consequence of the difficulties which the law interposes towards

The defender reclaimed, and argued ;—The discussion fell to be taken on the footing that the security in so far as granted over the defender's estate

No. 183.

July 19, 1887.
Scott's Trustee v. Scott.

transactions that may affect a minor's heritable estate, Cleland took care to keep himself safe by getting a collateral security from William Scott, the father, over his lands of Graynes, a different estate, of course, from the pupil's estate—the pupil's estate being derived from his mother. It appears that the father's heritable estate affords a sufficient security for the borrowed money. But he has become bankrupt; and, in the interests of creditors, the trustee on the father's sequestrated estate contends that the debt contracted to Matthew Cleland should, in the first instance, be paid out of the son's estate, in so far as the money can be shewn to have been beneficially employed in the improvement of that estate. He admits his liability, of course, for the balance that arises upon his collateral security—security given in express contemplation of such a result. Now, to obviate a proof, the parties have agreed that it may be taken that the money was applied beneficially to the extent of £500. To that extent the son is lucratus; and I suppose it follows that if he pays the £500 he has suffered no lesion from the transaction which his father entered into on his behalf. But upon the account between father and son with reference to the rents of the son's estate there arises a balance against the father of £310, which, if it could be set against the £500 to which I have referred, would reduce the sum due to £190. It is contended on the son's behalf, first, that the son ought not to be called on to pay anything; and, secondly, that at all events he is only to pay the £190, which is the nett benefit he has got out of the transaction, if you can identify the father with Cleland, the person who advanced the money at his request. On the first point, I am disposed to think it is not necessary, for the purposes of this action, to consider whether a bond granted by a tutor over the ward's heritable estate is a good security over the estate. That question could only arise here if the son's estate were insufficient to meet his obligations. But there is no question about the solvency of the son's estate, and therefore I do not need to consider the value of the bond as a security. But what I must consider is, in view of the fact that the son's estate has been benefited by the bona fide expenditure of money to the extent of £500, whether there is not an equitable obligation on the part of the son to repay the money so expended. I am clearly of opinion that the minor is liable to fulfil these equitable obligations founded on the law of recompense, which would attach to any person sui juris in the same circumstances. The disability of the minor only arises in regard to matters in which it is necessary that he should form an independent opinion and act upon it, because he is not supposed to be capable of protecting his own interests. But there are other matters as to which there is no difference between the case of a minor and of a person sui juris. The claim of recompense is a claim that does not arise in consequence of anything that the party benefited has done, or is called upon to do; but in consequence of something that has been done for his benefit without his consent. I am therefore of opinion that Mr Cleland has a good claim against William Scott junior to the extent of £500; and I am farther of opinion that the trustee of William Scott senior has the right to require Cleland to proceed against the son for that sum; because William Scott senior is only a cautioner, and it is the right of every cautioner at common law to call upon the creditor first to discuss the principal debtor. That is the benefit of discussion which is not said to have been excluded in this case, and about which no question has been raised.

“But now let me consider the second point, which is this, seeing that the trustee is the party who has raised the question, whether he ought to be affected by his constituent's obligation to account for the rents. Now, if William Scott, the father, before he became insolvent, had acquired right to the creditor's claim of recompense by making payment in terms of his collateral obligation, I am inclined to think that compensation would have taken effect ipso jure, and that William Scott junior would have been entitled to set off his claim for the rents against the father's claim upon the bond. But the result is not necessarily the same when the trustee for creditors acquires the bond. I am not aware that

No. 183. was wholly bad.¹ He was a pupil at the time of the transaction, and his father had no authority to enter into it. Further, the Lord Ordinary was wrong in supposing that the bankrupt would have been entitled to call upon Cleland to discuss the principal debtor before he could be called upon to meet the debt. That right had been abolished, when not expressly stipulated for, by the Mercantile Amendment Act, 1856. So that the case was reduced to the short question whether compensation was pleadable by the defender against the pursuer. That question really resolved itself into this,—who was the defender's proper creditor in the £1500,—the father or Cleland? Cleland could not have recovered it from the pupil upon the terms of the bond. It was money spent on his son's estate by the father,—and it was a mere accident that the father had had to borrow it. The defender had nothing to do with Cleland in the transaction. The reason for setting forth in the bond the object to which the money was to be applied was in order to define the relations of the father and his son. It was not for Cleland's benefit that this was done. The right to be relieved was no new right which the trustee had acquired. It existed in the father prior to his sequestration. The claim of the son for the rents also existed prior to that date. The one clearly fell to be set off against the other, i.e. the £310 against the £500, and the sum for which the defender should be held liable was only £190.

Argued for the respondent;—It was not clear that the bond was invalid,² and even if it were invalid as a security over the defender's estate, still Cleland was a creditor of the son in so far as the money was applied for his benefit. On principle there was no difference between this case and that of Paterson,³ although at first sight that case appeared to be adverse. Cleland was not the actual hand which expended the money, but looking to the terms of the bond, and to the history of the transaction, he had a title to see that the money he advanced was expended upon the pupil's estate. The pursuer, having he has acquired it. What he is here asking under the summons is that Cleland should discuss the principal debtor, and if the principal debtor is discussed and payment obtained there never could be compensation, because there never was the same creditor and same debtor in the two transactions. But supposing that the trustee has provisionally paid the debt, reserving his right of relief, then I am of opinion that in this case compensation does not take place. No doubt under the rule of the balancing of accounts in bankruptcy, the trustee cannot exact full payment from a debtor to the sequestered estate, and at the same time require the other to take payment of a dividend upon a counter claim. But this doctrine only applies where the two claims have arisen before the bankruptcy. If the trustee, for the convenience of the trust, makes a payment whereby he acquires a right of credit against a third party, that is an asset which he holds for the benefit of creditors independently of the bankruptcy, and which he is entitled to realise in full, the debtor's claim being only a claim in bankruptcy, and inferring a right to a dividend. And therefore upon both points which have been argued, my judgment is in favour of the pursuer.

"I think it will be necessary that the conclusions of the summons should be modified, or that I should only give decree in qualified terms. I cannot hold that the bond and disposition in security formed a good security over the lands, but I may hold that a debt to the extent of £500 was incurred by William Scott junior to Cleland."

¹ Davidson v. Mackenzie, May 31, 1826, 4 S. 640; Dickson v. Torrie, Elchies, voce Tutor, 15; i. Ball's Comm. 132-134; Stair, i. 6, 18.

² Fraser on Parent and Child, 252, 256.

³ Paterson v. Greig, July 18, 1862, 24 D. 1370, 34 Scot. Jur. 692.

paid Cleland's debt, stood in his shoes, and had a good claim against the defender.¹ The assignation was in favour of the trustee for the benefit of the estate, and it was he who had made the creditor's right effectual. That of course was subsequent to the sequestration. The father was a mere cautioner in the transaction in relation to the defender.² The claim for rents collected by the father was available against the father only; the trustee did not acquire his right through the father, but as a purchaser for the benefit of the estate. There was therefore no concursum debiti et crediti. The Lord Ordinary's interlocutor was therefore right.

No. 183.
July 19, 1887.
Scott's Trustees v. Scott.

At advising,—

LORD PRESIDENT.—This is an action at the instance of the trustee upon the sequestrated estate of William Scott, merchant, Strathaven, the object of which is to recover from the bankrupt's son a sum of £1500 said to have been expended by the father as administrator-in-law for his son in improvements on a heritable estate belonging to the latter. The son was born in 1870, and on his mother's death in 1874 he succeeded as her heir to the estate in question, named Summerhouse. The mother was not infeft in the property, and consequently her husband had no right of courtesy over it. The effect of the son's succession was that not only did he become immediate fiar, but that the rents of the estate also belonged to him. His father, as his administrator-in-law, was of opinion that it was desirable to expend money in improving the estate, which was a small one of about 100 acres. It is said he expended about £1500 in these operations,—particularly in the erection of a steading, and in fencing and draining,—and all without the authority of the Court. In order to meet the expenditure so incurred, he borrowed a sum of £1500 from a Mr Cleland, in security of which he granted the bond which is set forth in the condescendence.

The bond proceeds upon the narrative that the father had deemed it right to borrow the sum of £1500 with a view to the improvement of his son's lands, and in order to defray the expense of a steading, and he acknowledges to have borrowed and received that sum from Matthew Cleland, "which sum he bound the said William Scott junior, and himself as tutor-at-law foresaid, and also himself as an individual, and their respective heirs, executors, and representatives whomsoever, without the necessity of discussing them in their order, to repay to the said Matthew Cleland, . . . and in security of the personal obligation therein before written, in the first place, he, as tutor-at-law foresaid, disposed to and in favour of the said Matthew Cleland and his foresaids, . . . All and Whole the said lands of Summerhouse, therein particularly described; and, in the second place, he, for himself, disposed to and in favour of the said Matthew Cleland and his foresaids," certain lands called Graynes in the county of Lanark. Then the bond proceeds,—“And whereas the said sum of money had been borrowed only for the purpose of making the said improvements on the said lands of Summerhouse, and was intended by him to form a charge thereupon, and upon his said son as proprietor thereof, and his personal obligation therefor had only been granted, and the said lands of Graynes had only been disposed as an additional security to the said Matthew Cleland, therefore

¹ Bell's Comms. ii. 123.

² Bell's Princ. 538; Stewart's Trustees v. Stewart, Nov. 8, 1878, 6 R. 145.

No. 183. the said William Scott did thereby declare that the said sum should be and was thereby constituted primarily a burden upon the said lands of Summerhouse and proprietor thereof, and only secondarily a burden upon the said lands of Graynes, and proprietor thereof, and that in the event of himself or his successors in the said lands of Graynes paying the said sum, or interest thereon, they should be entitled to relief from the said lands of Summerhouse and proprietor thereof, and for the purpose of operating such relief they should, if they requested it, be entitled to an assignation of the said bond and disposition in security from the said Matthew Cleland,"—that is, of that part of the bond and disposition in security which affected the pupil. It is averred that the £1500 was expended beneficially on the pupil's estate, and that supposing the bond is not effectual as a security against that estate there is ground for demanding repayment of the £1500 on the plea of recompense, because the father, as his son's administrator-in-law, beneficially expended that sum on the estate. The 4th article of the condescendence shews how the money was expended. On the other hand, there is an averment by the defenders in answer to the 5th article of the condescendence to the effect that,—“Explained that this defender's father was solvent at and for a considerable time after the execution of the said bond, and that he has drawn the whole rents of this defender's lands since the succession opened in 1874, amounting to £750 or thereby. He has never accounted to this defender, but it is believed and averred that he received rents and other funds, belonging to the estate of this defender, more than sufficient to extinguish the amount to which this defender's estate was increased in value by the expenditure on his lands, and this would be made to appear on a proper balancing of accounts between them. These funds were not kept separate and distinct from his proper individual estate. At least this defender is not liable to make payment of the amount by which it may be held that the value of his estate was increased as aforesaid except under deduction, pro tanto, of the sums so due to him by his father's estate.”

That being the state of the averments, it would have been necessary to have a proof; in the first place, in order to see how far the expenditure was beneficial, and in the second, to see the amount of the rents which were uplifted by the father. But the necessity for a proof has been obviated by a joint minute which has been lodged by the parties, to the terms of which it is necessary very particularly to attend. It is stated that the parties had agreed, “first, that the expenditure referred to in condescendence 4 of the record, by this defender's father, William Scott senior, should be held as having improved this defender's lands of Summerhouse in value (both at the date of said expenditure, and at the present time) to the extent of £500; second, that the said expenditure, but only to the extent of the said £500, and interest thereon at £4 per centum per annum, from the 15th day of May 1879, forms a proper item of charge against the estate of this defender, in the accounting between this defender and the estate of his said father, William Scott senior; and third, that the balance due by this defender upon an accounting between him and the pursuer, as trustee upon the sequestrated estate of the said William Scott, amounts to the sum of £190 sterling, as at the date hereof, and they accordingly craved the Lord Ordinary to pronounce an interlocutor disposing of the cause, and to find neither party liable in expenses.” I must say it appears to me that this minute amounts to a settlement of the case. The trustee is seeking on the one hand to recover from the minor defender the amount which has been beneficially expended by the father on the estate, and that is fixed by the minute at £500. On the other hand, the son is claiming to set off the amount of rents which have been drawn by his father and not accounted for by him during his administration. That is ascertained to amount to £310, the balance thus being £190. If I had had this joint minute laid before me as Lord Ordinary, I should have given decree against the defender for £190, and there would have been an end of the case. But it appears that the parties did not intend such a result, and they accordingly left the Lord Ordinary to dispose of what they call the law of the case. I am very averse to force against parties the meaning of a joint minute which they are unwilling to accept and which they did not intend, and I am the less disposed to do so because I think the joint minute affords very fair grounds for a judgment.

July 19, 1887.
Scott's Trustee v. Scott.

In the first place, it cannot be disputed that the bond, so far as the minor's estate is concerned, is invalid and goes for nothing. In the second place, it must be observed that the whole expenditure that was made upon the minor's estate was made by the father as his administrator-in-law. Hence it is very clear that the only person who can claim recompense is the father, because he is the only person who made the expenditure, and I never heard of anyone claiming recompense except the person who made the expenditure. The claim of £500, as now restricted, was a claim undoubtedly due to the father before his sequestration, which did not occur until February 1885. On the other hand, it is equally clear that the rents uplifted by the father and amounting to £310, were all uplifted before his sequestration, and therefore there was before the sequestration a debt of £500 due by the son to the father, and a debt of £310 due by the father to the son. If we apply to this state of the facts the usual and well-known rule for balancing accounts in bankruptcy, we have just the result which is brought out in the joint minute. There is no occasion for inquiry whether both sums are presently payable or are both liquid or not. That might be very important in an ordinary case of compensation, but in balancing accounts in bankruptcy the ordinary rules do not apply. It is very well known that in balancing accounts in bankruptcy a future debt can be set off against a present debt, and an illiquid claim against a liquid claim. The rules in bankruptcy differ entirely from the ordinary rules of the common law, and I can see no difficulty in applying the former to the present case, and in setting off the mutual claims—the one against the other—in common form.

It seems to be thought that there is a peculiarity here, arising from the circumstance that the money expended on the improvements was borrowed money, and that on the face of the bond it was made clear to what purpose the money was to be devoted. This does not appear to me to affect the case. It was not the creditor who made the expenditure, and accordingly the creditor is not in a position in which he can make a claim for recompense. The claim can only be made at the instance of the father and his trustee, and the case in my opinion is of the simplest description. The trustee has paid the amount of the bond to the creditor, and has thought fit to take an assignation to the security over the pupil's estate, but if the security is good for nothing I do not see what advantage is to be gained by the assignation. What has taken place is, that the creditor has been paid the amount of the security out of the lands belonging to the bankrupt, and he is therefore out of the case with the interest he represented.

No. 183.

July 19, 1887.
Scott's Trust-
tee v. Scott.

No. 183. So that there is no party here except the father and his trustee upon the one side, and the minor pupil upon the other.

July 19, 1887.
Scott's Trust-
tee v. Scott.

In these circumstances I think the Lord Ordinary's interlocutor is wrong, and the sum to which alone the trustee is entitled is the balance ascertained according to the ordinary rules of bankruptcy.

LORD MURE.—I have come to the same conclusion upon the admitted facts as they are stated in the joint minute, and assuming that it is still open to us to inquire whether the claim of set off can be made good. I think that we are dealing substantially with a case of bankruptcy, and that Mr William Scott senior, the father, must alone be regarded as the creditor. If we were to go further and to inquire where he got the money which he expended upon his son's property, and thereby to introduce collateral rights, it would lead to an invasion of the rule which regulates the balancing of accounts in bankruptcy, and which has been found so beneficial in practice. Without going further into the delicate questions which have been argued, I shall only state that I agree with your Lordship in thinking that the case is one in which that rule applies; and that the pursuer cannot exact full payment from the defender, and at the same time require him to accept a dividend only upon his counter claim for the rents uplifted by the bankrupt. The reasons which the Lord Ordinary assigns for giving effect to the collateral right which existed in Mr Cleland, and has now been assigned to the pursuer, are not, in my opinion, sufficient to entitle the pursuer to ask us to depart from the rule that, at the date of the bankruptcy, the relative position of the debtor and creditor was fixed, and that the trustee must take the right of the bankrupt tantum et tale as it existed in him. I therefore think that the Lord Ordinary's interlocutor should be recalled, and that we should give decree for £190 as brought out in the minute.

LORD SHAND.—I am of opinion, differing from your Lordships, that the interlocutor of the Lord Ordinary is sound, and ought to be adhered to. If the joint minute for the parties were to be read in the narrow view which has been suggested, there would at once be an end of the case. For in that view of its terms it settles that the balance due by the defender on the accounting between him and the pursuer shall be held to amount to £190, and craves that the Lord Ordinary shall pronounce an interlocutor disposing of the cause, and finding neither party liable in expenses. But I think both parties made it clear that neither of them intended that the minute should be so read, and that it was prepared and given in solely for the purpose of saving inquiry, and admitting certain facts which would enable the Lord Ordinary to give judgment. That the defender did not consider that the minute was to be read in the way suggested, or that it exhausted the cause so as to leave nothing for determination, is clear from the fact mentioned by the Lord Ordinary in his note, that it was contended on the son's behalf, "first, that the son ought not to be called on to pay anything; and secondly, that at all events he is only to pay the £190." The true object of the minute was to fix, as is done in its third branch, the amount of the son's indebtedness to his father on an accounting between them, on the assumption that the defender is to be held entitled to set off the rents referred to in answer 5 against the pursuer's claim, and on that assumption the balance is fixed at £190, and proof is thereby obviated. But the question No. 183. whether compensation can be maintained is for the Court to decide, and I accordingly hold that we must proceed to deal with that question.

July 19, 1887.
Scott's Trustee v. Scott.

It is to be observed at the outset that the action as originally raised was limited to this, that the pursuer asked for decree of declarator that the bond and disposition in security of 23d April 1879 formed a good security over the lands of Summerhouse. That conclusion was rested on the view that a tutor acting for his pupil son was entitled to borrow upon the security of the pupil's estate, and had power to grant an effectual security. I must express my entire concurrence in the views which have been stated by your Lordship in the chair in regard to the validity of the bond. If the case had stood there, I should have been clearly of opinion that it did not form a good charge upon the pupil's estate, because it was undoubtedly ultra vires of the tutor to grant it. On that view of the case I am quite against the pursuer.

But before the discussion came on before the Lord Ordinary the parties stated that they were desirous of making the action available for the purpose of having all questions between them decided, and agreed that the summons and pleadings should be amended for this purpose. Accordingly the pursuer introduced an amendment, which represents his case as founded not on the bond and disposition in security only, but while he uses the bond and refers to it as giving a history of the transaction, he now pleads that the sum of £1500 was an advance by Cleland made for the purpose of improving the pupil's estate, and expressly made for that purpose. In this view the advance is said to have been a loan given for a specific purpose, and specially with a view to the money being expended in a particular way, viz., in benefiting the ward's estate, and it is said that this is made clear by the terms of the bond as a record of the transaction. It is further maintained that de facto the money was so employed. The contention of Scott's trustee, the pursuer, is that although Mr Scott senior was liable under the obligation of relief contained in the bond, he was practically only in the position of cautioner for a debt which fell primarily to be paid out of the pupil's estate, and that Cleland, when he lent the money, looked to the liability of the owner of the estate, and that the father was merely a cautioner.

What then are the facts? I am of opinion that the pursuer has made out his case upon these. There is this vital difference in the view I take of the case from that which your Lordships have taken. I do not think that Mr Scott senior was the proper creditor of his son for this advance. I think that Cleland became the direct creditor. The bond and disposition in security expressly bears that the money was asked for the purpose of improving the lands in question, and defraying the expense of erecting a suitable steading. The money was advanced upon that footing. It is provided that whereas the money was borrowed only for the purpose of making improvements on the lands of Summerhouse, and was intended to form a charge upon these lands and their proprietor in the first place, yet the father guaranteed the repayment, but subject to the condition that if called upon to pay the loan he should have relief from the lands of Summerhouse. It is not clear whether the money was all applied to Summerhouse, but in condescendence 4 it is stated that Mr Scott senior "proceeded to expend the money so obtained in improving the lands of Summerhouse," and in the joint minute it is admitted "that the expenditure referred

No. 183. to in condensation 4 . . . should be held as having improved the July 19, 1887. defender's lands of Summerhouse in value (both at the date of said expenditure Scott's Trust- and at the present time) to the extent of £500."

tee v. Scott.

I entirely lay aside the bond as a bond and disposition in security. But suppose the case of a factor borrowing money and granting a receipt to the effect that it was borrowed expressly for the purpose of improving his principal's estate, and suppose the creditor took the receipt upon that footing,—looking for recompense to the ward's estate,—who is the creditor? I think the person who gave the advance is the creditor. I am far from saying that if the money was advanced on the factor's own personal security without any stipulation or condition as to its employment, and then expended on improvements like the present, that any obligation against the estate would be created. For instance, if Mr Scott senior had borrowed £1500 and had then happened to lay it out upon the estate, I think the case would be different. But where, as here, the lender takes every precaution, and there was a clear arrangement between the parties that it was given on the one hand and borrowed on the other for the purpose of being expended in improvements, and when further the money to the extent of £500 was so expended, I think the lender is the primary creditor of the owner of the estate in the claim of recompense, and not the person who held the fund and through whose hands it passed. This is doubly clear from the circumstance that the person who got the money granted an obligation personally, qualified with the condition that he should have the true lender's right of recovery.

The cardinal point on which I differ from your Lordships is that I look upon the transaction as a money advance, no doubt, to Mr Scott senior,—but to him as his son's tutor-at-law, and so practically to the son,—the father being in the position of mere cautioner. It appears to me, looking at the bond merely as a record of the footing on which the money was lent, that the lender with a view to the validity of his claim of recompense was entitled to require the money to be expended on permanent improvements on the lands of Summerhouse, and could by interdict have restrained the use of the money in any other way. If this be the correct view of the case, which I take in common with the Lord Ordinary, and £500 was applied as stipulated for, what are the rights of parties, seeing that Mr Scott senior has become bankrupt?

Cleland being the creditor, if the father had paid him in terms of his obligation before bankruptcy, the son would have been entitled to say that his claim for rents in the father's hands must be deducted from the father's claim under the bond, for there would have arisen a proper case of concursum debiti et crediti. The father's trustee, however, since the bankruptcy has had to pay Cleland. He has paid him the sum of £1500, and Cleland the creditor's rights against his son are thereby acquired for the bankrupt estate. It is settled that if a trustee in bankruptcy acquires a claim after the sequestration has come into existence, the debtor in that claim cannot plead compensation as against the bankrupt's estate. The Lord Ordinary has put this proposition in a way to which none of your Lordships can take exception,—“If the trustee for the convenience of the trust makes a payment whereby he acquires a right of credit against a third party, that is an asset which he holds for the benefit of creditors independently of the bankrupt, and which he is entitled to realise in full, the debtor's claim being only a claim in bankruptcy, and inferring a right to a dividend." It is of no consequence that the third party is himself a creditor of the estate. He cannot plead compensation against a debt so acquired. Accordingly, it appears to me that the doctrine of tantum et tale is quite inapplicable here. If the bankrupt had paid Cleland before the date of his bankruptcy, he would then have been a creditor on his son's estate, and the latter would have been entitled to set off the claim for rents against his father. Since the date of the bankruptcy the trustee has acquired the rights of Mr Cleland, the creditor. Mr Cleland could have followed up and demanded his debt from Scott junior on the ground of recompense. Equally so can the trustee. Accordingly I am of opinion that the proposition to set off a claim for rents against the claim by the trustee for the £500 is not warranted, and on the whole matter I agree with the Lord Ordinary, and think his interlocutor should be adhered to.

No. 183.

July 19, 1887.
Scott's Trustees v. Scott.

LORD ADAM.—If the parties who framed the joint minute in this case did not intend that it should dispose of the questions raised in the case, I do not think more unfortunate language could well have been used. But we are told that this was not its object, and that the object was to ascertain the sum due upon the one side or the other, leaving the question of law open; and, accordingly, the question which we have to consider is, whether or not the defender is entitled to set off the £310—the amount of the rents which have been collected by his father—against the £500 which is ascertained by the minute to have been the amount to which his estate was lucratus by the father's expenditure.

I think that question must be solved by the answer to this one, whether the defender was debtor to Cleland in the sum of £500. Before we can ascertain that, we must look to the terms of the bond and disposition in security. We are all of opinion that the bond is invalid, because it is ultra vires of a tutor-at-law to dispose the lands of his pupil ward, whether absolutely or in security, and there is no personal liability. Accordingly, prima facie, it would appear that there was no relation of debtor and creditor between the son, who is the defender here, and Cleland. But then it is said that the £500 was de facto beneficially expended on the estate, and that, therefore, there is a liability on the defender's part to repay it. I am of opinion that that is so, but then the question remains, To whom is there that liability?

I am decidedly of opinion that there never was any liability as between the defender and Cleland. It does not appear to me that Cleland had anything to do with the expenditure of the money. He lent upon the security specified in the bond, and upon no other. The bond no doubt sets forth that the object of the loan was the improvement of the ward's estate. But that was only, in my opinion, in order to shew clearly what the relation of the two ex facie debtors under the bond was; and I do not think that Cleland had anything to do with that narrative of the history of the transaction, or that it was introduced into the deed with reference to his rights. He does not appear to me to have had any right to interfere with the expenditure of the money. Is it conceivable that it was the intention of parties that Cleland might come forward and say, "You shall expend the money you have borrowed from me in this way or in that"? In that view he would have had a right to be consulted as to the improvements proposed to be executed, and to judge whether they were likely to be beneficial or not. He would have been entitled to say whether the funds were to be devoted to the erection of a steading or not. There is no intention on the face

No. 183.

July 19, 1887.
 Scott's Trustees
 v. Scott.

of this bond to confer such a right. Yet that is the result of Lord Shand's opinion, in my view. No case is more common than that of a creditor who has a right to regulate the expenditure of funds which he has advanced, and we know the provisions which are made to meet the case—such as consigning the money, and so on. It is a matter of everyday experience in connection with building transactions. But there is not a trace of that here, so far as I can judge. I think it is altogether to misrepresent Cleland's position to say that he had a right under this bond to direct how and when the money which he had lent should be expended, or to look to the mode of expenditure as an additional security. I do not think there was the least intention that he should have any further rights in regard to the disposal of the money than an ordinary creditor has—and all that is said in regard to that matter in the bond was introduced for the purpose of describing the relations between the debtors in the bond, and not with a view to Cleland's interest.

The result shews that Cleland's interests were quite safe. He has got payment of his money, and has got it from the only true debtor in the bond. When the £1500 originally came into the father's hands, I think he could have spent it, as far as Cleland was concerned, in any way he pleased. If this is the true view of the position of the parties, there is an end of the case. The tutor before the date of the bankruptcy was indebted to his ward in the £310, and by the rules of accounting in bankruptcy the ward is entitled to set off that sum against the £500, which it has been found by the minute he is due the pursuer. I agree with the majority of your Lordships that the Lord Ordinary's interlocutor ought to be recalled.

THE COURT pronounced this interlocutor:—"Recall the said interlocutor: Find that William Scott senior, as administrator-in-law for his pupil son William Scott junior, expended on his son's heritable estate a sum of £1500, and that to the extent of £500 the money was beneficially expended and the pupil was lucratus: Find that quoad ultra the amount of said expenditure is not a good claim against the pupil or his estate: Find that said expenditure was made entirely before the date of the said William Scott senior's sequestration: Find that before the sequestration the said William Scott senior uplifted rents of the pupil's estate to which he had no right, and for which he has not accounted, to the extent of £310: Find in law that in balancing accounts between the pupil and his administrator-in-law the sum of £310 falls to be set against the sum of £500, and that the balance due by the pupil to the pursuer as trustee in his father's sequestration is £190: Therefore decern against the defender William Scott junior, who has now attained the age of puberty, for payment to the pursuer of the sum of £190 sterling, with interest thereon at the rate of five per centum per annum from the date of citation until payment: Find the defenders William Scott junior and his curator ad litem entitled to expenses since the date of the Lord Ordinary's interlocutor," &c.

TODD, MURRAY, & JAMIESON, W.S.—D. LISTER SHAND, W.S.—Agents.

JOHN BEATON, Pursuer (Reclaiming).—J. C. Thomson—W. Campbell.
W. IVORY, Defender (Respondent).—D.-F. Mackintosh—Jameson.

No. 184.

July 19, 1887,
Beaton v.
Ivory.

JOHN MACPHERSON, Pursuer (Reclaiming).—J. C. Thomson—W. Campbell.
JOSHUA M'LENNAN, Defender (Respondent).—*D.-F. Mackintosh—
M' Lennan.*

Reparation—Wrongful apprehension—Public officer—Malice.—In order to found a relevant action of damages against a public officer for a wrongous official act, it is not enough to aver malice in general terms, but facts and circumstances must be set forth from which the Court or a jury may legitimately infer that the defender was not acting in the discharge of his duty, but from a malicious motive.

Observed that there may be cases between private individuals where a general averment of malice will be sufficient.

Observations on Scott v. Turnbull, 11 R. 1131.

Public officer—Powers of magistrate.—Observations upon the powers of magistrates to make apprehensions without written warrant.

JOHN BEATON, residing at Herbista, Skye, and cowherd for the neighbouring township of Peingown, brought an action of damages for wrongful apprehension against William Ivory, Sheriff of Inverness, Elgin, and Nairn. His averments were:—(Cond. 2) "On or about 27th October 1886 the pursuer was engaged in his ordinary occupation of herding cattle on the said pasture ground when he was accosted by two police-constables, one of whom was constable Grant of Edinbane, near Portree, who demanded his name, which the pursuer gave. Grant then apprehended the pursuer and marched him down to the township of Herbista, where he gave the pursuer in charge of a body of marines. The pursuer asked Grant the reason of his arrest, but got no reply. The pursuer was then marched (in custody of the marines) three miles to Duntulbin Bay, put on board the gunboat 'Seahorse,' and conveyed as a prisoner to Portree, where he arrived about 11 P.M., and was taken to the prison and confined in a cell. Next day he was brought before Sheriff-substitute Hamilton and questioned by the procurator-fiscal for more than an hour. He was not again taken before the Sheriff, but was detained in prison until the following Saturday, October 30th, when he was liberated without any explanation for his arrest. No document was served upon the pursuer shewing why he was arrested and detained in custody, nor have any further proceedings been taken against him." (Cond. 3) "Grant possessed no warrant for arresting the pursuer, nor had any information been received either by him or by the defender, or by any of the authorities, charging the pursuer with the commission of a crime. Grant arrested the pursuer in obedience to general instructions given to the police by the defender, who was personally present at the township of Herbista, where he had come with a large body of police and marines for the purpose of apprehending the parties who had (as was alleged) deorced a sheriff-officer near Herbista two days before. The instructions referred to were that the police should search for, apprehend, and convey to prison every person whom they could find in the locality where the alleged deorcement took place. . . . The said instructions were illegal and oppressive, and the apprehension of the pursuer in pursuance hereof was wrongful, and was moreover malicious and without probable cause on the part of the defender. The defender had no probable cause or believing that the pursuer had been concerned in the alleged deorcement. In point of fact the pursuer was not present at the deorcement,

1ST DIVISION,
Lord Fraser.
M.

No. 184.

July 19, 1887.
Beaton v.
Ivory.

but was more than a mile away at the time repairing the roof of his house. Both the pursuer and his wife and others informed the defender of these facts shortly after the pursuer's apprehension; but the defender nevertheless persisted in detaining him in custody."

The defender in his answers referred to the criminal proceedings in the case, and explained that he took no part in them, but confined himself to the execution of his duty as executive officer in charge of the expedition which the Government had found it necessary to send to Skye. The answer to cond. 3 was,—“Admitted that on the occasion in question the defender, in pursuance of instructions received from the Lord Advocate and Secretary for Scotland, and in the discharge of his duty as the executive officer responsible for the execution of the law in the island of Skye, had accompanied a force of police and marines which had been despatched to the district in question in order to effect arrests in connection with the recent deforcement of Alexander Macdonald, the officer of the law mentioned in the preceding answer. Believed to be true that in the course of the said expedition the pursuer was arrested by the constable mentioned as a person who was suspected to be among those guilty of the said deforcement, and explained that at the time he was taken into custody he was identified by the said Alexander Macdonald as one of the members of the crowd who had taken part in the said deforcement. Quoad ultra denied. The expedition was accompanied by the Sheriff-substitute, the sheriff-clerk, and the procurator-fiscal, and the defender took no concern with the particular arrests, but confined himself strictly to his duty as the magistrate in charge of the expedition."

The pursuer pleaded;—The pursuer having been wrongfully arrested and detained in prison by the instructions of the defender, and, separatim, the defender having acted maliciously and without probable cause, the pursuer is entitled to decree as concluded for.

The defender pleaded, inter alia, that the pursuer's averments were not relevant.

The Lord Ordinary (Fraser), on 28th May 1887, held that the action was not relevant, and dismissed it.*

* “OPINION.—The claim in this case is for damages against the Sheriff of the county of Inverness, because it is alleged that he wrongfully arrested and detained in prison, maliciously, and without probable cause, the pursuer of this action.

“The circumstances, as appearing from the record, are these: The pursuer, who is a herd, was apprehended on the 27th of October 1886, taken to Portree and detained there for three days, when he was liberated. The person by whose orders the pursuer was apprehended and detained was the defender, the Sheriff of the county of Inverness. In this county, and especially in the island of Skye, there had occurred tumultuary proceedings; meetings were held at which resolutions were passed of a very illegal character—pointing to the resistance of payment to the landlords of their rents. The law had been set at defiance by the deforcement of an officer of the law, and it was found necessary to supplement the ordinary executive officers of the law by additional police force and Royal Marines in order that judgments of Courts of law should be carried out. At the head of this force of police and marines was the Sheriff of the county, and along with him there came the officer of the law (Alexander Macdonald, a messenger-at-arms), who had been deforced. The Sheriff gave verbal instructions to the police to apprehend all those who could be identified as persons who had been guilty of this deforcement; and Macdonald identified the pursuer as one of these persons, and he was immediately taken into custody and carried to Portree.

“At Portree the pursuer was brought before the Sheriff-substitute upon the

The pursuer reclaimed, and argued;—(1) The Lord Ordinary had taken a very unusual course when dealing with a question of relevancy, for he had accepted as true the statements made in the defender's answers, even where these were in direct contradiction to the pursuer's averments. And he had further looked at the documents produced by the defender, viz., a signed information and petition, which he was not entitled to do at this stage. The pursuer's case was that he was apprehended simply because he was found in the locality. The Lord Ordinary assumed, which he had no right to do, that there had been an identification of the pursuer by Macdonald prior to the apprehension. It would be extravagant to argue that a written warrant was necessary in every case of apprehension, but if an apprehension was ordered, it must be because the person to be apprehended had been seen in the act of committing a crime, or there was reasonable ground for believing that he had com-

No. 184.

July 19, 1887.

Beaton v.

Ivory.

charge of mobbing and rioting, and of obstructing and deforming the messenger-at-arms in the execution of his duty; but after consideration of the matters laid before him, the Sheriff-substitute found that there was not sufficient evidence to justify a committal for trial, and the pursuer was liberated.

"Everything here was regularly gone about in usual course, with one exception. There was no written warrant for the apprehension of the pursuer, and consequently the apprehension, it is said, was illegal.

"Now, this proposition is untenable. A magistrate, according to the law of Scotland, is entitled, if he sees a crime committed, at once, himself, to apprehend the delinquent, or to give a verbal order to any policeman or citizen to do so. Nay, although he does not himself see the crime committed, but is informed upon credible authority that it has been committed, he may give a verbal order to pursue and apprehend the suspected person. Baron Hume states that in such a case it 'is a sufficient justification of a verbal order to the informer and others, to pursue and take the individual, thus positively charged, who might escape through the delay of waiting for a written warrant,'—(II. Hume, 75). The messenger in the present case was deformed by a mob of people, the names of whom he did not know, but the faces of whom he remembered. The deforcement took place on the 25th of October 1886. The Sheriff, with the police and marines came to the ground on the 27th of October, and the police received orders from the Sheriff to apprehend any person identified by the deformed messenger, and upon these general instructions the pursuer was apprehended. What the Sheriff here did was entirely within his power. He met an assemblage of people, but had then no means of ascertaining the names of the persons who were the wrongdoers, except by getting them pointed out on the spot by the deformed messenger. Written warrants were out of the question in such circumstances. Before a formal complaint and warrant could be written out the wrongdoer would have been away over the hills.

"It would be idle to send this case for trial in any view, seeing that malice must be proved. Now, to say that the action of the Sheriff was malicious is to contradict the statement upon the record to the effect that the pursuer was apprehended under 'general instructions'—unless, indeed, it be meant to be averred that the Sheriff had malice against the whole population of crofters. In what he did in this case the Sheriff evinced firmness and resolution, and if he had not done so he would not have done his duty. If the chief magistrate of a county, responsible for its peace, were to lie under the threat of actions of damages for what he did in the bona fide execution of his duty, the result would be that his powers to quash tumult and insurrection would be altogether paralysed. It seems to be forgotten that the freedom from responsibility for damages—the absolute privilege that is given to the chief magistrate endeavouring to do his duty—is given to him not for his own sake, but for the sake of the public, whose servant he is, and for the advancement of justice. Upon this ground the Lord Ordinary is of opinion that no relevant case has been stated for the pursuer, and that the action must be dismissed."

No. 184. mitted a crime. But a general order to apprehend all persons in a locality was very different. There was therefore a prima facie case for an issue of this kind, viz., whether the pursuer was apprehended by order of the defender wrongfully and illegally given. (2) It was not necessary to aver or prove personal malice. If a reckless disregard of the rights and liberties of others was proved, that was enough. What was done here by the defender was in itself illegal. If it had been legal, but carried out in a harsh and oppressive way, then no doubt the pursuer would have been obliged to take an issue of malice, and facts must have been averred from which to deduce the malice.¹

July 19, 1887.
Beaton v.
Ivory.

The respondent argued;—(1) No case of damages for wrongful apprehension by a public officer could be cited where malice and want of probable cause were not both held to be necessary. A general averment of malice was not enough; there must be averments of facts and circumstances from which malice could be inferred.² A case of judicial slander—e.g., *Scott v. Turnbull*²—was the strongest case for presuming the absence of malice, but a case of the nature of the present, against a public officer, was only second to it. It was said that there were averments in this case shewing such recklessness in the character of the orders given by the pursuer as to reasonably imply malice. But, even upon that footing, the statements made were vague and ambiguous. It might have been quite proper for the Sheriff to order all the grown-up people in the locality or township to be apprehended, as he had information that they were all guilty. That was in his discretion. And, accordingly, while something short of personal ill-will might be sufficient, it was not enough to prove the mere absence of probable cause, or that the defender had not sufficient grounds for suspecting that the whole inhabitants of the township had been art and part in the deforcement. Both malice and want of probable cause required to be put in issue. (2) The pursuer's general averments of malice and want of probable cause were negatived by the official documents produced, which were part of the record, viz., the signed information by the deforced officer, and the petition and warrant. The absence of a warrant was not very material here, because the names of the persons engaged in the deforcement might not be known until they were brought up for identification. The documents were not perhaps evidence, but were part of the res gestæ. The pursuer had had an opportunity of making any explanation he chose about them at adjustment of the record, but he had not done so.

LORD PRESIDENT.—I think the whole question now under consideration depends upon the terms of the third article of the condescendence, in which the pursuer avers that Grant, the police-officer who apprehended the pursuer, "possessed no warrant, nor had any information been received either by him or by the defender, or by any of the authorities, charging the pursuer with the commission of a crime. Grant arrested the pursuer in obedience to general instructions given to the police by the defender, who was personally present at the township of Herbista, where he had come with a large body of police and marines for the purpose of apprehending the parties who had (as was alleged) deforced a sheriff-officer near Herbista two days before. The instructions referred to were that the police should search for, apprehend, and convey to prison every person whom they could find in the locality where the alleged deforcement took place." No. 184.

¹ Denholm v. Thomson, Oct. 22, 1880, 8 R. 31; Bayne v. Macgregor, March 14, 1863, 1 Macph. 615, 35 Scot. Jur. 368; Urquhart v. Dick, June 10, 1865, 3 Macph. 932; Cameron v. Hamilton, Jan. 31, 1856, 18 D. 423 (Lord Deas, p. 426), 28 Scot. Jur. 179; Arbuckle v. Taylor, May 1, 1815, 3 Dow's Appa. 160; Rae v. Linton, March 20, 1875, 2 R. 669; Craig v. Peebles, Feb. 16, 1876, 3 R. 441; Urquhart v. Grigor, Dec. 21, 1864, 3 Macph. 283, 37 Scot. Jur. 134; Hassan v. Paterson, June 26, 1885, 12 R. 1164.

² M'Murphy v. Campbell, May 21, 1887, supra, 725; Scott v. Turnbull, July 18, 1884, 11 R. 1131; Urquhart v. Grigor, Dec. 21, 1864, 3 Macph. 283, 37 Scot. Jur. 134.

July 19, 1887.
Beaton v. Ivory.

Now, the allegation that general instructions were given to apprehend persons who were suspected of having been engaged in deforcing the officer two days before is not in any respect relevant. I think that was a very proper course to pursue upon the face of it, because the averment of the pursuer impliedly admits that there had been a deforcement at Herbista two days before, and that it had been found necessary—for all that is implied also—to assemble a large body of police as well as of marines for the purpose of ensuring the apprehension of the persons who had been engaged in the riotous proceedings. It is said, however, "that the instructions referred to were that the police should search for, apprehend, and convey to prison every person whom they could find in the locality where the alleged deforcement took place." Now, that is undoubtedly the strongest averment made by the pursuer, and prima facie, there is a kind of recklessness about an order such as that, viz., that everybody in a locality should be apprehended. But one cannot help knowing—indeed it is patent upon the face of this record—that Herbista is a small township, the inhabitants of which cannot be very numerous; and that the rioting two days before had been of a very serious character, probably involving almost all, if not all, the inhabitants of this township. There must have been a large number of rioters, because it was found necessary to assemble so large a force as the pursuer himself admits.

If it had not been that the pursuer is under an obligation to aver and prove malice as the condition of his succeeding in his case against the defender, I should have been of opinion that we could not have disregarded that averment made as it is, and must have sent the case to trial. But I think there is a very special protection surrounding the defender in the execution of his duty as Sheriff of the county, and so responsible for the peace of the county. That protection extends to this, that he will not be liable for anything that he does in the performance of that duty unless it can be shewn that he was actuated by a malicious motive of some kind. The mere use of the word "malice" in a case of this description is, I think, quite insufficient to fulfil the condition upon which alone such an action can be entertained. The presumption in favour of a public officer that he is doing no more than his duty, and doing it honestly and bona fide, is a very strong one, and certainly ought not to be overcome by the simple use of the word "malice." I think the duty of the pursuer in a case of this kind is to aver facts and circumstances, from which the Court or a jury may legitimately infer that the defender was not acting in the ordinary discharge of his duty, but from an improper or malicious motive. I must not be supposed as enouncing the proposition that in every case where malice requires to be libelled it is necessary to be so specific as I say the present pursuer must be. There are cases where I think an averment of malice in general terms may be sufficient as between private individuals; but I do not know of any case in which an action has been sustained against a public officer in the execution of his duty where the presumption of a proper motive has been held to be displaced by a mere general averment of malice, and I should think it

No. 184.

July 19, 1887.
Beaten v.
Ivory.

most unfortunate if any such rule were to be introduced into practice. It is for the benefit of the public, and for the interests of justice and good government that public officers acting in the execution of their duty should be surrounded by a very considerable protection. The circumstances brought out in the third article of the condescendence I need hardly say are not such as to warrant any inference of malicious motive, and therefore in that respect I conceive the record to be irrelevant.

I am very much inclined to adopt the opinions which were delivered by the Second Division in the recent case of M'Murphy v. Campbell, supra, p. 725, referred to in the course of the discussion, and I only desire to say in regard to the opinion of one of the Judges there that I think he has a little misapprehended an observation which I made in the case of Scott v. Turnbull, 11 R. 1131. In matters of this kind it is very desirable that one should never be misunderstood without correcting the misunderstanding, and that must be my apology for bringing this personal observation into the case. Lord Rutherford Clark, in referring to the case of Scott v. Turnbull (ante, p. 729 and 24 S. L. R. 516), in support of the view he took in M'Murphy's case, said,—"Although I cannot say that I altogether agree with the rule so broadly stated,"—that is to say, so broadly stated as it was by me in Scott v. Turnbull. I think his Lordship can hardly have adverted to the fact that that was a case of judicial slander, and it was a case of judicial slander in which the averment complained of was an averment strictly relevant to the case in which it was made. And it is in reference to such a case as that, and such a case only, that I made the observations which are contained in the report, and certainly I never intended to lay down a general rule in such terms as applicable to all cases. I think a case of judicial slander a very special case indeed, because there is a very strong presumption in such a case that if a man makes an averment which, whether it be irrelevant or not, is at least pertinent to the case, he must be presumed to have made it from an honest motive, with a view to urging everything that he knows of in support of his case. That is a perfectly justifiable and proper motive, and it will protect the party making it against the consequences of any injury that he may have done by that statement to a third party. Now, this becomes all the more strong if the averment is not only pertinent to the case, but is a perfectly relevant averment, for then it becomes the duty of the party to himself and to his advisers and to the Court to make the averment. The case would not be complete, and would not be ripe for judgment, unless the averment were made, and therefore the presumption in favour of proper motive in such a case is stronger than in almost any other case of slander.

I think it right to make these observations, because I have always considered a case of judicial slander to be a very special one, and in like manner I consider a case of a public officer to be a very special one, although upon totally different grounds. There is a very high privilege both in the one case and in the other, but they are totally different kinds of privilege.

I am of opinion that this record is irrelevant, because there are no facts and circumstances averred from which a malicious motive upon the part of the Sheriff can be inferred.

LORD MURR concurred.

LORD SHAND.—If this question had arisen entirely with reference to the first ground upon which the Lord Ordinary proceeded, I should have had some difficulty in concurring with his Lordship. I doubt whether, at least in a record made up as this has been, without any revisal and therefore without having the pursuer's answers, whether admissions, explanations, or, it might be, merely evasive replies, the defences and the documents there founded on ought to be taken into account and acted on in a question of relevancy.

No. 184.
July 19, 1887.
Beaton v. Ivory.

But I entirely agree with your Lordship upon the other ground, with reference to which the Lord Ordinary says,—“It would be idle to send this case for trial in any view, seeing that malice must be proved.” It is said by the pursuer that general instructions were given by the defender that the police should search for, apprehend, and convey to prison every person whom they could find “in the locality” where the deforcement took place, and that from this malice may be inferred. The very statement of the generality of the order seems to negative the proposition that the defender acted from malice towards the pursuer. Malice has no meaning except as applied to individuals. It is of the utmost importance for the public benefit that an official in the position in which the defender was should have the fullest protection in the discharge of his public duty. A very strong force was admittedly required in order to seize the persons guilty of the deforcement, and prompt and decisive action was required, and if we were to entertain actions of this kind,—founded upon the assumption that an order of apprehension was given which may have been injudicious or imprudent, and, in the opinion of some, even somewhat reckless, where there was no feeling of malice against the individual,—it would paralyse those who are engaged in the execution of a public duty, and deter them from doing what they thought was right and proper, and what might even be necessary for the vindication of the law in the circumstances. I think there should be such a shield put round public officials in the performance of such duties as will prevent their feeling that they will be liable for actions of this kind for an error in judgment.

I agree with your Lordships in thinking that in order to make an action of this kind relevant there must be averments which will shew, if proved, that the defender acted from improper motives, such as can be characterised as malicious. In the absence of such averments, I think this record is irrelevant.

LORD ADAM concurred.

THE COURT adhered.

The following case came next in the roll to that of Beaton v. Ivory, and was heard immediately after it :—

JOHN MACPHERSON, crofter, Glendale, Skye, brought an action of damages for wrongous apprehension against Joshua M'Lennan, Procurator-fiscal of the Sheriff Court of the Skye district of Inverness-shire, under the following circumstances as averred by him.

No. 185.
July 19, 1887.
M'Pherson v. M'Lennan.

On 10th November 1886, the defender presented a petition to the Sheriff for a warrant to apprehend the pursuer and the Rev. D. M'Callum, minister of Waternish, on certain charges of having promoted an unlawful agitation against paying rents and taxes and for resisting the execution of legal warrants for the recovery of these, and of having incited the inhabitants to resist and obstruct the officers of the law in enforcing these warrants and decrees by attending and speaking at certain public meetings, and otherwise, as set forth in the petition. The pursuer further averred ;—“(Cond. 3) Upon the petition being presented to him, Mr Sheriff-substitute Hamilton granted a warrant in the following or similar terms :—‘ . . . The Sheriff-substitute grants warrant to search for, seize, and apprehend John Macpherson and Donald M'Callum complained 1st Division.

Lord Fraser.
M.

No. 185.

July 19, 1887.
M'Pherson v.
M'Lennan.

upon, and to bring them up for examination; and also to search and to cite for precognition, all as craved J. GUY HAMILTON.' The defender then caused a large body of police and marines to proceed to Glendale, and to surround the pursuer's house at a very early hour in the morning of Saturday, November 13, 1886. A number of the police then entered the house, and the superintendent in charge of the party of police stated the offence with which the pursuer was charged, and of which he then heard for the first time. The pursuer asserted (and it was the fact), that he was innocent, and that he would at any time have gone to Portree, if the authorities had intimated by letter or telegram that they desired his presence. The police nevertheless proceeded to apprehend the pursuer, to search his house, and to remove him as a prisoner on board the gunboat 'Jackal.' The pursuer submitted quietly, but he had much difficulty in inducing his wife to allow him to be taken away, as she was in delicate health, and was greatly agitated by the proceedings of the police, as were also the other members of his family." "(Cond. 4) The pursuer was conveyed to Portree on board the 'Jackal,' and detained in the police-office there for about two hours, until about 8 P.M. on the same day. He was then taken before the Sheriff-substitute (Hamilton). Upon the defender reading the charge against him, the pursuer again protested that he was innocent, and as shewing that he did not advocate a policy of 'no rent,' he stated that he had shortly before paid a year's rent for hiscroft. The defender then applied for, and the Sheriff-substitute granted, warrant to commit the pursuer to prison, 'to be detained for further examination.'

Bail to any amount was tendered for the pursuer, but the defender refused to consent to his liberation." "(Cond. 5) The pursuer was then taken to the prison of Portree, where he was searched and deprived of everything except the clothes he was wearing, and detained till about 10 P.M. on Saturday, November 20, a period of seven days. During all this time he was kept in close confinement, and not allowed to communicate with anyone. He sent several messages to the defender requesting to see him, but the defender took no notice of these applications, and refused to consent to the pursuer's liberation, though offers of bail were repeatedly made to him. The pursuer was liberated without any explanation or apology. As he wished to set at rest the anxiety of his family, the pursuer, the same night on which he was liberated, started to walk to Glendale, and reached his house (a distance of 35 miles) about 10 A.M. on the following morning. No further proceedings have been taken against the pursuer." "(Cond. 6) The whole of the proceedings above detailed were taken by the defender against the pursuer in reckless disregard of the rights and liberty of the pursuer, and were oppressive, malicious, and without probable cause. The petition presented to the Sheriff by the defender bears to proceed upon 'information received'; but the pursuer believes and avers that the only information which the defender had received on the subject consisted of an erroneous report of the proceedings at the meetings referred to in the petition which had appeared in certain newspapers. It was the duty of the defender to inquire into the accuracy of the said reports before he instituted the said proceedings against the pursuer; and if he had made the slightest inquiry he would easily have ascertained that the reports in question were incorrect, and that there was no ground for the charges set forth in the petition. Instead of following this course the defender recklessly and maliciously began by causing the pursuer to be apprehended and imprisoned, and then proceeded to make the necessary inquiries. The defender had no justification in applying for a warrant of apprehension. The offences charged against the pursuer were not alleged to have been committed de recenti, and the defender had no reason to suppose that the pursuer, who was a householder resident in the district, would disobey a warrant of citation, or seek to evade criminal proceedings by flight." No. 185.

July 19, 1887.
M'Pherson v.
M'Lennan.

The defender stated, inter alia;—"The proceedings taken by the defender were adopted upon information received by him officially as procurator-fiscal; they were taken solely in the public interest, in good faith, and with probable cause. Explained that the pursuer had for some years been a prominent leader in an agrarian agitation conducted in Skye, and in particular in the district of Glendale, where the pursuer resides, and that various acts of lawlessness had occurred in connection with said agitation, in some of which the pursuer had taken part . . . Explained that in these circumstances, the defender received official information as to violent and inflammatory language and resolutions, used and passed at the meetings mentioned in the summons, at which meetings the pursuer presided or was present. He had also before him reports of the said meetings which had appeared in the newspapers, and precognitions, all appearing to verify the correctness of said reports. He was also aware that the pursuer, although knowing the terms of said reports (which had excited public attention, and were much canvassed) had taken no steps to repudiate their correctness. Acting upon the information thus before him, the defender conceived it to be his duty to take the proceedings complained of, which were followed out in all respects in ordinary course. The defender did not consider himself justified in citing in place of apprehending the pursuer. He did not believe that the pursuer would obey a citation. On considering the precognitions taken, and the pursuer's declaration, the Sheriff-substitute considered it proper to commit the pursuer to prison for further inquiry, and further inquiry was accordingly at once made—more particularly with reference to the pursuer's denial, made for the first time in his declaration, of the correctness of the newspaper reports of the meetings in question. The result was that owing to the difficulty of obtaining trustworthy evidence, and in particular owing to the denial by witnesses of statements previously made by them, the defender found that the charges could not be exhausted without a protracted and delicate inquiry." The Sheriff-substitute thereafter found that there was not sufficient evidence to justify a committal, and the pursuer was liberated.

The issue proposed by the pursuer was:—"Whether on or about the 13th day of November 1886, the defender maliciously, and without probable cause, caused the pursuer to be apprehended and imprisoned in the prison at Portree, to his loss, injury, and damage? Damages laid at £500 sterling."

The Lord Ordinary (Fraser), on 28th May, found that the pursuer's statements were not relevant, and dismissed the action.*

* "OPINION.—The proceedings in this case have been entirely regular and in usual form. The defender presents a petition to the Sheriff setting forth various alleged offences by the pursuer, and prays for warrant to apprehend him. The warrant for apprehension is granted, and under this warrant the pursuer is apprehended and carried to Portree, and there imprisoned during a period of seven days, while his case was under consideration. The defender avers that he had received official information as to the crimes charged against the pursuer; that he had seen reports of meetings in the newspapers at which the pursuer had attended, and had taken or seen precognitions appearing to verify the correctness of the reports. The resolutions referred to were of a very violent character, to the effect of refusing to pay rents, and to resist the officers of the law in case of eviction. It turns out in the result that the defender, the procurator-fiscal, was under a mistake in supposing that the pursuer was one of the delinquents; at

No. 185.

July 19, 1887.
M'Pherson v.
M'Lennan.

The pursuer reclaimed, and argued;—In this case there were facts and circumstances set forth which clearly inferred malice on the defender's part. The defender had set the machinery of the law in motion, relying only on newspaper reports, which were incorrect; whenever he made proper inquiry he found that the charges were groundless. There was harshness and oppression on the face of the proceedings. Besides the newspaper reports, which were the only justification for the defender's action, ought not to be taken into account in a question of relevancy.

The respondent argued;—(1) That there were no averments inferring malice; and (2) that the Lord Ordinary was wrong in holding that there was an absence of probable cause. A procurator-fiscal, finding reports in four different newspapers uncontradicted by the pursuer for three weeks, was quite justified in taking the action he did.

LORD PRESIDENT.—I do not think it is possible to sustain the relevancy of this case, according to the opinions expressed in the former action. No doubt the pursuer was apprehended upon the application of the procurator-fiscal. Perhaps it might have been sufficient that he should have been cited, but that is a matter so entirely in the discretion of this public officer that it would be a very dangerous thing to interfere in it.

LORD MURE, LORD SHAND, and LORD ADAM concurred.

THE COURT adhered.

J. & J. GALLETLY, S.S.C.—J. & A. PEDDIE & IVORY, W.S.—
GORDON FRINGLE, DALLAS, & Co., W.S.—Agents.

No. 186.

July 20, 1887.
Steedman v.
Steedman.

WILLIAM STEEDMAN, Pursuer (Respondent).—C. S. Dickson—Forsyth.
MRS MAGDALENE BROWN OR STEEDMAN, Defender (Reclaimer).—Hay.

Husband and Wife—Divorce—Adultery—Pater est quem nuptiae demonstrant—Strength of presumption.—The presumption pater est quem nuptiae demonstrant may be rebutted by evidence which satisfies the Court that the husband was not the father.

all events, he did not go on with the prosecution, and the pursuer was accordingly liberated.

“The precognitions which the defender says he had got have not been produced, but the reports of the meetings as reported in the newspapers which the pursuer attended have been so. The Lord Ordinary cannot find anything in the conduct of the procurator-fiscal of such a character as to subject him to damages. No doubt he might have prayed for the citation, instead of the apprehension, of the pursuer; but then the crave for apprehension is not a relevant ground of complaint. It was open to the Sheriff, instead of granting that warrant of apprehension, to have granted a warrant of citation. Probably what influenced him in granting the warrant he did was the certainty that a warrant of citation would have been disobeyed. Then as regards the complaint of the refusal of bail, the answer to this is, that bail cannot be accepted or demanded until the accused is committed for trial, which was not done in the present case.

“As regards probable cause, the Lord Ordinary is of opinion that the defender was not entitled to crave warrant for the apprehension of the pursuer merely because of reports in newspapers. If the matter had stood upon this defence the case must have gone to trial, but, as the Lord Ordinary is of opinion that a merely general allegation of malice against a public officer like the fiscal is not sufficient, without some special averment of malice, he has thought it right to dismiss this action.”

Circumstances in which the Court held that the presumption was rebutted, No. 186.
although the husband and wife at the time of the child's conception resided in the same village.

July 20, 1887.
Steedman v.
Steedman.

WILLIAM STEEDMAN, master mason and quarryman, Lochgelly, and his wife were married in November 1865. About six weeks after their marriage they quarrelled and separated, Steedman returning to live in his father's house next door to his wife; but he continued to visit her up to the winter of 1868. She thereafter removed to another house in Loch-gelly, aliment being paid her by her husband. There were then two children of the marriage, one born on 3d April 1866, and the other on 29th July 1869.

1st Division.
Lord M'Laren.
M.

In October 1885, Mrs Steedman bore another child, and this action of divorce for adultery was forthwith brought by her husband, who alleged that the child was the fruit of adulterous intercourse with some man or men unknown.

The pursuer averred that since some time previous to the birth of their second child, he had not visited or had intercourse with the defender, nor had he been in her house or spoken to her except on two occasions in 1869, when he was arranging the terms of an agreement to pay her aliment.

The defender in answer stated;—"The pursuer continued to visit the defender in the evenings up to November 1869, and he again commenced visiting the defender in the beginning of October 1884, and continued these visits down to the beginning of March 1885. These visits were generally in the evenings between seven and nine o'clock, but he never remained all night with the defender. In consequence of the intercourse with the pursuer the defender was again delivered of a third child on 4th October 1885 named William."

At the proof the defender deponed that her statement on record was incorrect, and that she had had meetings with the pursuer between 1869 and 1884.* No one spoke to having seen pursuer and defender together during that period, and the defender's case was entirely uncorroborated.
On the other hand, there was no evidence of adultery or even of intimacy between the defender and any other man. Otherwise the purport of the evidence sufficiently appears from the opinions of the Judges.

The Lord Ordinary (M'Laren), on 17th November 1886, granted decree of divorce.†

* She deponed;—"The statement in the answers to this case, that pursuer continued to visit me till November 1869, and that he again commenced visiting me in October 1884, is not correct. Between 1869 and 1884 he wanted me to leave for a foreign country. I did not tell that to my agent. I neglected it.
It was in the evening between 8 and 10 o'clock that my husband visited me.
He did not come on any particular day of the week—towards the end of the week. He did not visit me in the summer, only in winter, when it was dark.
He always came at night, for fear any person would see him. I suppose he was afraid of his sisters and brother. He did not see anyone in my house when he visited me. My daughter was often at the singing when he came. She is 17 years of age."

† "OPINION.—This is a narrow case, but, after taking time to consider the evidence, I have come to the conclusion that the pursuer is not the father of the child to which the defender gave birth on 4th October 1885, and, therefore, that the charge of adultery is proved.

"The parties were married in November 1865, and about six weeks after the marriage they separated, in consequence, apparently, of differences about money matters. The wife (defender) continued for a time to reside in the married home, and the husband went to live with his father, brother, and sister in the

No. 186. The defender reclaimed.¹
At advising,—

July 20, 1887.
Steedman v.
Steedman.

LORD MURE.—This is a somewhat special and, as the Lord Ordinary has remarked, narrow case. It is an action of divorce by a husband who has been living separate from his wife for a great many years, but in the same town, and who alleges that since the end of 1869 he has never been in the same house same street of Lochgelly in which his wife resided. About three years later the defender brought an action for aliment against her husband, which, in February 1870, was settled by a minute of agreement. Since then, the parties have continued to live apart, in Lochgelly, in different quarters of the town.

"The case of the defender is that her husband, during the period of the separation, made clandestine visits at her house in the evenings, and that he is the father of the child. The pursuer admits that he occasionally visited the defender during the first three years after the marriage; but he states that since 1870 he has never seen his wife, giving as his reason that he suspected her of improper intimacy with men.

"So far as the case depends on direct evidence, we have nothing but the statement of the husband, contradicted by that of the wife. The wife is entitled to have it remembered in her favour that she has borne a good character, has brought up her children respectably, and is not proved to have been unduly intimate with other men.

"It appears to me, however, that the wife's story is intrinsically incredible. I can understand that she should receive visits from her husband after their separation; but such visits would not naturally be of a clandestine character; and if they were continued, as the wife says they were, I think it is quite certain that the fact must have come to be known to some person or persons other than the defender herself. Farther, when the defender became pregnant, if her story were true, she certainly would have informed her husband of the fact, and would probably, for the sake of her own reputation, have mentioned the circumstance of her husband's visits to her family and friends. She admits that she did not inform the pursuer of her pregnancy, and she is unable to bring forward any witness to prove that her husband had been seen visiting her house since the separation. I may add that none of the husband's family profess to have any knowledge of the alleged visits.

"A very remarkable, and, to my mind, conclusive piece of circumstantial evidence has now to be noticed. Since the separation of the parties, a large tumour or wen has appeared on the pursuer's forehead. It is, I need hardly say, a very noticeable feature of the pursuer's face, and one which could not fail to attract his wife's attention if she had ever seen him after it appeared; yet, when under examination, she was unable to say that any change had taken place in her husband's face since she knew him, and she seemed very much surprised when her husband entered the Court-room, and, with the growth on his face, was presented to her for identification.

"In all the circumstances, I shall find the adultery proved, and grant decree of divorce."

¹ Reclaimers' Authorities.—Stair's Inst. iii. 3, 42; Bankton, i. 2, 3 and 4; Erskine's Inst. i. 6, 49; Routledge v. Carruthers, May 19, 1812, F.C.; Innes v. Innes, July 7, 1835, 7 Scot. Jur. 470, H. L. 2 Shaw & Maccl's Appa. 417; Sandy v. Sandy, July 4, 1823, 2 S. 453; Jobson v. Reid, Jan. 19, 1830, 8 S. 343; Mackay v. Mackay, Feb. 24, 1855, 17 D. 494; Walker v. Walker, Jan. 23, 1857, 19 D. 290; Tulloh v. Tulloh, Feb. 28, 1861, 23 D. 639; Brodie v. Dyce, Nov. 29, 1872, 11 Macph. 142; Gardner v. Gardner, May 30, 1876, 3 R. 695, H. L. 4 R. 56; Reid v. Milne, Feb. 8, 1879, 6 R. 659; Montgomery v. Montgomery, Jan. 21, 1881, 8 R. 403.

Respondent's Authorities.—Morris v. Davies, 1837, 5 Clark & Fin's Repa. 242; Tait on Evidence, 490.

with the defender, or had intercourse or communication of any kind with her, No. 186. and the action is raised on the ground that the defender committed adultery in the years 1884-5 with some person or persons unknown to the pursuer, which resulted in her giving birth to a child in October 1885, of which the pursuer was not the father. July 20, 1887.
Steedman v.
Steedman.

The fact of the birth of this child is not disputed, but the adultery is denied, and it is alleged that the pursuer is himself the father of the child, having, as the defender alleges, visited and had intercourse with her occasionally in 1884 and 1885; and one peculiarity of the case is, that the parties, after their separation in 1866, had intercourse with each other in the defender's house, which resulted in the birth of their second child in 1869; and the defender's allegation on record in this case is that this clandestine kind of intercourse was renewed and continued for some time in the year 1884. Upon the admitted facts of the case as set out in the record it is clear that there was no intercourse of any kind between the parties for fifteen years prior to the alleged visits in 1884.

In that state of matters your Lordships have to decide whether the present pursuer can be held to have established his case, especially looking to the circumstances that he and his wife lived near each other and in the same village. The state of the law does not admit of any dispute. In the last case which came before this Division on this branch of the law I appear to have given the opinion of the Court, and to have said this (Montgomery, 8 R. 403)—“Whatever difficulty there may have been some years ago in laying down the law relative to the application of the rule pater est quem nuptiæ demonstrant, in circumstances such as those which here occur it may, I apprehend, be held as now authoritatively settled, both in this country and in England, that the rule may be met by direct or even circumstantial evidence sufficient to negative the presumption, and that in dealing with such a case the question to be disposed of is one of fact, viz., whether the circumstances disclosed in evidence are such as to satisfy the Court that no sexual intercourse took place between the parties at the period when it is alleged that it occurred.” And then I refer to the case of Patterson, 11 Macph. 142, and to the opinions expressed by Lords Lyndhurst and Cottenham in the English case of Morris v. Davies, 5 Clark and Fin. 242, as corroborating the view I had expressed.

That being the law upon the subject, I have to say that after anxious consideration I have come to the same conclusion as the Lord Ordinary. I think the child is not the result of intercourse between the pursuer and defender. There is no evidence in the case to shew that they have ever met during the last fifteen years, or that the pursuer has ever seen the defender during that time. The pursuer's evidence is quite distinct, and completely negatives the allegation that he was in the defender's house in 1884. It is, further, of the greatest importance in the case that the parties admittedly lived separate for fifteen years, and that the pursuer is not proved to have been seen with the defender or at her house during that period. These facts are strongly confirmatory of the pursuer's case that he never was there, and taken along with the other fact of the birth of the child, they go a long way to shake the presumption of law to which I have referred. But that would not be sufficient if the defender's story was a credible one.

The question accordingly turns upon the relative credibility of the pursuer and defender. I see nothing which leads me to doubt the truth of what the pursuer says, and, as I have mentioned, what he says is confirmed by the other

No. 186.

July 20, 1887.
Steedman v.
Steedman.

evidence. But the defender is in this position—that while she alleges on record that the pursuer continued to visit her till November 1869, and that he did not again visit her till October 1884, when she is examined she gives a different account, for she states that he visited her frequently during the interval, and that he wanted her to go to a foreign country. This evidence is directly contradictory of her admissions on record. But in addition I agree with the Lord Ordinary that it is impossible to suppose the pursuer would not have been seen by someone if he had been coming about her house between October 1884 and March 1885. Then there was, further, a total concealment on the defender's part of the fact that the pursuer was coming about her, and also that she was with child. One woman is examined who seems to have taxed her with being in the family-way, but she did not say that the pursuer was the father. Indeed she never seems to have even hinted that to any of her friends.

These are all very remarkable circumstances, and I see nothing in the defender's case which at all shakes the credibility of the pursuer. His case is clear and consistent throughout, and is confirmed by the other evidence. I therefore agree with the Lord Ordinary in thinking that we can come to no other conclusion than that the pursuer was not the father of this child.

The Lord Ordinary has referred to a circumstance which struck him as a remarkable feature in the case. A wen has grown on the pursuer's forehead during recent years, and the Lord Ordinary thinks it would be impossible for the defender to have been visited by the pursuer, as she says she was, during 1884-85 without seeing this. I am of the same opinion.

The case is a narrow one, but looking to all the circumstances, and to the fact that the weight attaching to the maxim pater est quem nuptiae demonstrant may under recent decisions be held to be somewhat less strong than it once was, I am of opinion that we may grant decree of divorce.

LORD SHAND.—I have given very careful and very anxious consideration to the evidence in this case, with the result that I concur with Lord Mure in the view which he has taken. There is undoubtedly a very heavy onus upon a pursuer who raises an action of divorce in circumstances like the present—as heavy an onus as I can conceive in a question where the law of evidence is involved. Where a husband and wife are living in the same village and near one another, and the wife becomes the mother of a child, the law will presume that the husband is the father, and in order to rebut the presumption he must bring evidence such as will satisfy the Court that no connection did take place between them such as might have led to the birth. But taking the case in that light, I am satisfied that no such connection took place.

It appears that shortly after their marriage the pursuer and defender separated, and it is a curious feature that notwithstanding the separation, the pursuer did continue to visit his wife for about three years afterwards, and that a second child—a daughter—was born in 1869. But he states that from a certain date in 1869 he has never again visited his wife, and the reason he gives is, that shortly before the birth of their daughter on two different occasions when he was in his wife's house he heard knocks at the door which created a suspicion in his mind. In addition, a ladder was found against her window on a third occasion in very suspicious circumstances, and there is corroborative testimony to that effect, and that the man who is presumed to have used it was caught near the spot. The pursuer never returned after these events took place. The village is one with comparatively few inhabitants, but it is not said that there is anyone who can contradict the pursuer's statement that he did not visit his wife for fifteen years. If he had visited her there would surely be someone who would be able to speak to it. Further, the defender admits that no one ever saw the pursuer in her house during these years, and that she never told anyone he had been there. There is also another fact which provides most material corroboration of the pursuer's story, and satisfies me that it is true. A grown-up daughter, who was living with the mother in her house, says she never saw her father there. The evidence in support of the pursuer's case is therefore overwhelming unless there is something on the other side to displace it.

No. 186.
July 20, 1887.
Steedman v.
Steedman.

But when we turn to the evidence for the defender, I think we find very strong corroboration of the pursuer's case. She says that the pursuer's visits were frequent in winter, and that he was in the constant practice of coming clandestinely. If that had been the case I do not think it possible that he would not have been seen. To be added to that there is the extraordinary circumstance that she gives no explanation of her husband's absence from her, and of his coming at night when he did come. She indeed accounts for it by saying that she supposes he was afraid of his sisters and brother, but there is nothing to support that statement, and no such explanation was ever vouchsafed to anyone—she never even mentioned to the daughter that her father was there. She further tells a different story in the witness-box to what she stated on record. There is also the fact that he has a growth on his forehead which she had failed to remark, and which truly might have escaped notice once or twice, but could not do so oftener.

On the whole matter I am satisfied that the onus of proof has been discharged, and that we must give decree in the pursuer's favour.

LORD ADAM.—I think the onus which a pursuer undertakes in a case of this kind is very well stated in the case of Mackay, 17 D. 494. It is this, that there must be "such clear evidence as completely satisfies the tribunal which has to decide the question that de facto the husband is not the father of his wife's child." That being the question of law, I am not disposed to differ from the result at which your Lordships have arrived.

LORD PRESIDENT.—This like every other case affecting status or legitimacy is of importance, and I think it right to state my opinion regarding the effect of the presumption pater est quem nuptie demonstrant, and how far the pursuer of such an action as the present is under the onus of completely establishing a negative.

The pursuer's wife was delivered of a child in October 1885, and the presumption is that the pursuer was the father. If no evidence can be adduced to shew that the child was begotten in adultery, and that the husband was certainly not the father, then the law holds that the pursuer must be presumed to be so. This is an action of divorce on the ground of adultery, and as the pursuer founds on the birth of the child he must undertake to prove that he is not the father. There have been some recent cases, the result of which it may be said has been somewhat to weaken the strength of the presumption, but I agree with Lord Adam in thinking that the rule as laid down in Mackay's case (17 D. 494) ought to be taken as truly representing the state of the law regarding the matter.

No. 186. That being so, I think the evidence in this case requires severe scrutiny. Accordingly I have taken great pains to see whether the allegation that the husband is not the father of this child has been established.

July 20, 1887.
Steedman v.
Steedman.

Reference has been made to the case of Montgomery, 8 R. 403. The report of that case is rather misleading, because we are not told what the circumstances were. I have examined them, and I find there was very strong proof there of the defender's adultery with three different men. This is a very different case, and I have had great difficulty in reaching the conclusion to which Lord Mure and your Lordships have arrived. But I do not dissent, and I only wish to say that we are doing nothing to shake the strength of the presumption as settled in recent decisions, and particularly as laid down in the case of Mackay.

THE COURT adhered.

N. B. CONSTABLE, W.S.—JAMES SKINNER, S.S.C.—Agents.

No. 187. WALKER, HUNTER, & COMPANY, Complainers (Respondents).—D.-F. Mackintosh—Ure.

July 20, 1887.
Hunter,
Walker, & Co.
v. Falkirk
Iron Co.

FALKIRK IRON COMPANY, Respondents (Reclaimers).—Balfour—Wilson.
Copyright in design—Registration—Novelty—Utility—Patents, Designs, and Trade-Marks Act, 1883 (46 and 47 Vict. cap. 57), part iii.—Design for the door of a kitchen range which was held on the evidence to be a "new or original design not previously published in the United Kingdom," and therefore a proper subject for registration under part iii., sec. 47, of the Patents, Designs, and Trade-Marks Act, 1883.*

Sec. 60 of the Patents, Designs, and Trade-Marks Act, 1883, provides that "Design means any design applicable to any article of manufacture. . . . whether the design is applicable for the pattern or for the shape or configuration or for the ornament thereof, or for any two or more of such purposes." Held that where a design is registered for "shape or configuration," and a mechanical improvement is directly or incidentally secured by the adoption of such shape or configuration the mechanical improvement is secured by the registration of the design, though it might have been made the subject of protection by letters-patent.

Held that a design may be made the subject of registration, though it depict an article incomplete in itself, but which is intended to be used in combination with and as part of another article of manufacture.

Under sec. 52 of the Patents, Designs, and Trade-Marks Act, 1883,† the

* Sec. 47 provides,—“(1) The comptroller may on application by or on behalf of any person claiming to be the proprietor of any new or original design not previously published in the United Kingdom register the design under this part of this Act. . . . (3) The application must contain a statement of the nature of the design, and the class or classes of goods in which the applicant desires that the design be registered.”

† Sec. 52 provides,—“(1) During the existence of copyright in a design, the design shall not be open to inspection except by the proprietor or a person authorised in writing by the proprietor, or a person authorised by the comptroller or by the Court, and furnishing such information as may enable the comptroller to identify the design, nor except in the presence of the comptroller, or of an officer acting under him, nor except on payment of the prescribed fee; and the person making the inspection shall not be entitled to take any copy of the design, or of any part thereof. (2) When a copyright in a design has ceased, the design shall be open to inspection, and copies thereof may be taken by any person on payment of the prescribed fee.”

public are barred from demanding inspection of the design from the comptroller until the copyright has ceased. Held that where an infringement of copyright is complained of, the alleged infringer is entitled to call on the holder of the copyright to prove for what purpose—whether pattern, shape, or ornament—the design was registered.

No. 187.

July 20, 1887.

Hunter,
Walker, & Co.
v. Falkirk
Iron Co.

In July 1886 Messrs Walker, Hunter, & Company, of the Port Downie Iron Works, Falkirk, brought a suspension and interdict against the Falkirk Iron Company, and the individual partners thereof, in which they prayed the Court to interdict the respondents "from infringing the copyright of a registered design for kitchen range fire-doors, No. 16,596, the property of the complainers, conform to certificate of registration, dated 10th November 1884, granted in pursuance of the Patents, Designs, and Grades-Marks Act, 46 and 47 Vict. cap. 57, and in particular, from making, vending, or using any fire-doors for kitchen ranges having a moulding cast or fixed thereon in manner shewn in the design, a copy of which is annexed to the said certificate of registration, or in manner substantially the same, and from infringing the copyright of said registered design in any other manner of way."

1st Division.
Lord M'Laren.
M.

The design of the fire-door registered by the complainers shewed the door of a kitchen range, but unattached to the other part of the range. The door as shewn in the drawing was rectangular, with two lance-shaped hinges fastened by bolts to the door, and with projecting bolt-holes at the side, by which it was presumably to be attached to the rest of the range. Along the upper edge of the door was a moulding projecting backwards, intended to fit into the hot-plate which, when the range was used as a close range, closed in the top of the fire.

The registered design was not accompanied by any descriptive letter-press.

It appeared from the proof that the class of range for which the door was designed was what is known as a convertible kitchen range, i.e. a range which may be used as a close range or as an open fire. When the range is shut it is closed in on the top by a fire-plate, and in front by means of the door. When the range is used as an open fire, a bar known as the fall-bar falls down and projects from the fire; when turned up, it is flush with the fire, and allows the door to shut. To complete the shutting in of the fire when the range is closed, it is necessary to close the open space between the hot-plate and the door. It used to be the practice to effect this by putting an iron-plate or fire-cover on the top of the fall-bar. The design registered by the complainers was intended to do away with that iron-plate or cover, and this was effected by attaching a moulding to the door which fitted on to the edge of the hot-plate. When the range is shut this moulding, besides closing the aperture, serves to continue the moulding along the top of the oven and boiler front at each side of the fire, and thus makes the whole range more symmetrical in appearance.

The complainers averred that the respondents had made and sold doors having a moulding similar to that registered by them.

The respondents admitted, under reference to their statement of facts, that they were making and selling fire-doors of similar construction to those registered by the complainers, but averred that they were entitled to do so. They stated in their statement of facts:—(Stat. 2) "Sometime ago it occurred to the respondents that it would be better so to mould the upper portion of the door that when the fall-bar is up, and the door closed, the moulding upon the upper portion of the door should fit into the edge of the hot-plate, filling the space occupied in the other system by the mould-

No. 187. ing on the plate or fire-cover. The respondents accordingly constructed ranges on this principle. Several other parties in the trade have adopted the same expedient, and it is now in common use. The complainers were not the authors of said arrangement, nor did they acquire the same for a good or valuable consideration, or by any valid and exclusive legal title." (Stat. 3) "It is believed and averred that what the complainers have procured to be registered as a design is a door constructed in a manner adapted to the last-mentioned method of closing a range. Said alleged design is not a design within the meaning of the Patents, Designs, and Trade-Marks Act, 1883. It has no applicability to the purpose for which it is used 'for the pattern, or for the shape or configuration, or for the ornament thereof.' Its shape and configuration are accidental and unimportant, and unconnected with the purpose to be attained. If there is any merit in the method above described, it is not dependent on shape or configuration, but upon a combination of means producing a useful result, and such a combination cannot be protected by registration. In any event, said alleged design is not new and original. It consists only in an increase of the size of the door relatively to the size of the range, so as to fill space, which must be filled in all close ranges, and which may be filled either by bringing the top of the door to meet the hot-plate, by bringing forward the edge of the hot-plate till it meet the top of the door, or by filling the space between the top of the door and the edge of the plate by a moulding on the fall-bar. The form of the moulding is a common form of moulding, and possesses no novelty or originality." (Stat. 4) "The complainers have failed before delivery on sale of articles to cause each such article to be marked in terms of the Patents, Designs, and Trade-Marks Act, 1883, and relative rules for the registration of designs made and issued by the Board of Trade, and dated 21st December 1883, and in terms of the said Act their copyright in the design, if they any had, has ceased."

July 20, 1887.
Hunter,
Walker, & Co.
v. Falkirk
Iron Co.

The complainers pleaded, inter alia;—(1) The respondents having infringed the complainers' copyright as above condescended on, and having refused to discontinue said infringement, the complainers are entitled to have the interdict craved.

The respondents pleaded, inter alia;—(3) The complainers' alleged design not being a design or a proper subject of registration and certificate within the meaning of the Patents, Designs, and Trade-Marks Act, 1883, the note ought to be refused. (4) The complainers' alleged design not being new and original, the note should be refused. (5) The complainers not being the authors of said alleged design, nor having acquired the same, or the right to use the same, by a valid or exclusive legal title, are not the proprietors thereof within the meaning of the Patents, Designs, and Trade-Marks Act, 1883. (6) The complainers having failed before delivery on sale of articles, to which their alleged registered design has been applied, to cause each such article to be marked in terms of the statute and relative rules, their copyright, if they any had, has ceased. (7) The respondents not having infringed any rights of the complainers, the note should be refused. (8) The complainers having no copyright in said alleged design, the note should be refused, and the respondents found entitled to expenses.

Proof was led in the action, from which it appeared that the application made by the complainers for registration was for "a range door, with moulding on top, moulding forming front of range, shape to be registered." The certificate which they obtained bore that "a copyright of five years" was granted in respect of the application of the design to articles specified in Class I. of the Board of Trade rules applicable to No. 187. registration of designs.*

On the question of the novelty of the design it was proved that the respondents' workmen were led to adopt a moulding on the door similar to that registered by the complainers from seeing one of the complainers' designs. Two witnesses for the respondents—the Messrs Crosthwaite—stated that they had used a similar design, but the doors manufactured by them opened downwards, and not to the side. It was also proved that doors of a similar construction had been used in articles of furniture made of wood. The originality claimed for the shape of the moulding here, and the only novelty, consisted in its being so cut off at the ends that when the door was shut the moulding along the whole range was continuous. Mr Fairweather, patent-agent, Glasgow, one of the complainers' witnesses, deponed,—“(Q.) In your opinion, are the shape and configuration of the registered door essential to the objects to be attained as you have explained them? (A.) They are. (Q.) In your opinion, as a patent-agent, would it be a good subject-matter for a patent? (A.) Certainly not. (Q.) Why? (A.) Because there is no combination of operative parts to produce the objects to be attained. These objects are produced by the shape and configuration of the door, and by that alone. Cross.—There is nothing new in the door being rectangular. A moulding on it is not new by itself. The moulding in question is one variety of the ogee form of moulding, which is very common, and is used for ornamentation in every kind of work. (Q.) May I then take it that the really novel feature, according to your view, is the having a moulding on the top of the door which corresponds to the moulding in front of the hob? (A.) Yes, I think you may take that as my view. (Q.) Therefore the real novelty consists in the application of the contrivance as depicted to the total article, viz., the range? (A.) Yes, I think so. (Q.) Looking at the registered design No. 6, is there anything in that design which shews that the door there depicted is any part of a continuous line of moulding upon the range? (A.) No, it shews no more than the door, and is not intended to shew more. (Q.) Then there is nothing in the design as registered to shew the method of application? (A.) I think so; the whole thing is shewn on the design as registered; there is a door with an ogee moulding on the top. (Q.) But nothing to shew that that is to correspond to another ogee moulding along the top of the hot-plate? (A.) Certainly not. It shews all that is wanted—a completed door. It does not shew the rest of the range. (Q.) It comes to this—a rectangular door is not new? (A.) Not new. (Q.) A moulding is not new? (A.) It is not new. (Q.) And the combination of a moulding with a door, without anything else, is not new? (A.) The combination of a moulding with a door in this particular manner is new. (Q.) But without anything else? (A.) Not without anything else. (Q.) Then may I take it that there is nothing new in this design, in the parts, apart from the purposes to which the whole design is applied? (A.) There is only one part, the door consists of one piece. (Q.) Does it not come to this, that the whole of the parts of this registered article are old, but that what is new is the application of the combined parts to the purposes of the whole? (A.) No, it is the combining of parts that is new—the parts as combined. (Q.) And applied? (A.) And applied. Re-examined.—(Q.) A fire-door of this particular kind applied to a convertible range? (A.) Of course. (Q.) And the certificate of registration bears that it is a door for a range?

July 20, 1887.
Hunter,
Walker, & Co.
v. Falkirk
Iron Co.

* Class I. consisted of “Articles composed wholly or partly of metal not included in Class II.” Class II. consisted of “Jewellery.” See Brice on Patents, Designs, and Trade-Marks, p. 244.

No. 187. (A.) Yes. (Q.) Could you judge from the drawing appended to the certificate that it was intended to complete the range, and to serve the objects which you have explained? (A.) Certainly. By the Court.—
 July 20, 1887. Hunter, Walker, & Co. v. Falkirk Iron Co. (Q.) What are the goods in Class I. referred to in the certificate of registration? (A.) Class I. covers articles composed either wholly or partly of metal; it also covers goods of other make, but mainly metal. (Q.) How does it appear from the design or the certificate of registration that this is to be applied to the fire-doors of kitchen ranges? (A.) The drawing, I think, is sufficient in itself, but the application would bear that it was intended to be applied to that purpose. I am not certain if I saw the application, but I believe Mr Hunter, the complainer, consulted me about the registration. (Q.) Is there anything in the drawing or the certificate which conveys to your mind that this is a design for the fire-door of a kitchen range? (A.) I don't think it could be applied to anything else; it conveys that impression, because it is a door of a rectangular form, with hinges. (Q.) Then it is the drawing which conveys that? (A.) Yes, it conveys quite sufficient to my mind."

Mr Hunter, a partner in the complainers' firm, deponed,—“(Q.) What do you consider the point of the design which you gain by registering? (A.) The casting the moulding on the top of the fire-door. (Q.) The particular form of the moulding, in so far as composed of the ogee moulding, is of course not new? (A.) No. (Q.) And the application of the moulding to a door simply is not new? (A.) To a range fire-door I think it is. (Q.) Supposing it to be used on something else, not a range, it is not new I suppose? (A.) I suppose not. (Q.) Does it not come to this, that what is really new in your expedient is the application of the moulding to the completed fire-range, so as to afford a continuity of moulding when the whole thing is shut up? (A.) Yes, I think so. (Q.) Was this your own idea, or was it suggested to you by somebody else? (A.) It was my own idea. (Q.) Suggested by no one? (A.) No one. (Q.) A practical idea suggested by the proved inconvenience of having the moulding on the edge of the fire-cover or the fall-bar? (A.) That is so.”*

* The following evidence was also given:—Mr Foulis, ironmonger, Edinburgh, also one of the complainers' witnesses,—“Cross.—(Q.) Does the real merit of the invention consist in shutting up a place where formerly the cold air was apt to get in? (A.) Yes, that is so—principally. (Q.) The precise form of the article by which that hole is shut up would be immaterial? (A.) Yes, quite. (Q.) In your view, it would not matter whether this particular ogee moulding was replaced by another moulding of a different curve and character? (A.) No, I don't see that it would make any difference. (Q.) The whole merit of the invention is in the application of the door to the total range? (A.) To the Simplex range, or other ranges like it, with a folding bar; with the old close ranges that was not necessary, for they could be made tight without it. (Q.) That is the merit of the invention, and the precise character of the design does not matter? (A.) Yes.”

Mr Ross, hot-water engineer, Glasgow,—“Cross.—(Q.) What is new about complainers' door? (A.) The moulding on the top of the door. (Q.) The moulding is the ordinary ogee shape? (A.) Yes. (Q.) Have you ever seen a door with a moulding on it? (A.) Yes, but not applicable to a range. (Q.) But there was nothing new in a door having a moulding upon it? (A.) No, nothing. (Q.) In its application to a range it was new to you? (A.) Yes. (Q.) Was not the reason of that this, that its application to the range filled up a hole where hitherto the draught was likely to come in? (A.) That was certainly an improvement. Formerly the moulding was put on the fire-cover or on the fall-bar—generally on the fire-cover. (Q.) And the novelty of this consisted in putting it on the fire-door? (A.) Yes. (Q.) And thereby making it more convenient? (A.) Certainly. (Q.) Then the object would be equally

It was proved on the matter of utility that this moulding completely shut in the top of the fire when the door was shut, and that where the aperture was shut in by means of a moulding attached to the hot-plate the plate was so heavy as to be difficult to handle; and when it was attached to the fall-bar, and the bar was let down, it intercepted an appreciable part of the heat of the fire.

On 5th February 1887 the Lord Ordinary (M'Laren) repelled the respondents' pleas, and granted interdict as craved.*

No. 187.
July 20, 1887.
Hunter,
Walker, & Co.
v. Falkirk
Iron Co.

well served by any door that had a moulding which filled up that space, irrespective of the particular design of the moulding and of the back of the door? (A.) The moulding must correspond with the moulding on the range, or it would not meet. (Q.) If you alter the moulding on the range to suit the moulding on the door, the object will be equally well attained by any mode of filling up that space, irrespective of the particular design of the moulding? (A.) Yes; of course it must be applicable to the range. (Q.) The merit of the invention consists in the application of it to the range? (A.) Yes."

* "OPINION.—In this case the complainers are applying for interdict against the infringement of their registered design, No. 16,596, by the respondents. For reasons of convenience in the Acts of Parliament, under which exclusive privileges are granted to the originators of ornamental designs, no description of the design is permitted to enter the register; but the certificate of registration is accompanied by a perspective or diagrammatic drawing of the design, as the case may require, and the certificate is granted for the application of the design shewn in the drawing to goods of a certain class. In the present case, the certificate bears that a copyright of five years is granted in respect of the application of the design to articles in Class I. The drawing attached to the certificate is a perspective representation of an iron door, with a moulding cast on the top edge. The moulding is shewn cut off at each extremity in such a manner that it would fall in line with any continuation of the moulding which might be cast on the object to which the iron door is to be fitted. It appears from the evidence that the door shewn in the drawing is the fire-door of a kitchen range. I should infer from the drawing itself that the moulding was intended to be continuous with the moulding of the object to which the door was to be fitted; because if the moulding were intended to apply only to the door, I should have expected that it would be shewn 'returned,' or finished off in some way at the angles; and, according to the evidence, the drawing would be so interpreted by persons accustomed to deal in such things. The drawing does not bear to be a door of a kitchen range, but it is recognisable as such by persons who sell or use such articles, just as a drawing of the fire-bars of a sitting-room grate would be recognised by everyone who uses an open fireplace of the construction familiar in this country. As I have already said, the statute does not authorise the insertion of descriptive matter in the certificate, and the drawing must be self-interpreting.

"The novelty claimed by the designer consists in this: that his design is the first application of the idea of a continuous moulding along the front of a kitchen range, inclusive of the fireplace door. The respondents deny the merit and originality of the design, and also maintain that it is not a proper subject of copyright of design. The objections may be conveniently treated together. It appears to me that the design has such merit and originality as entitle it to copyright protection, provided it can be shewn to fall within the scope of the Designs Act.

"The standard of originality to which an inventor must attain in order to have legal protection is in no case a high one. I do not enter here upon the illustrations which the law of patents affords. But confining my view to the subject of design copyright, I take it to be clear that it is not necessary that the design should have any artistic merit. In the present case, no originality is claimed for the pattern of the moulding; the novelty consists in it being cut off at the extremities so as to be continuous with the moulding on the range. This is an example of what may be called constructive design; and without

No. 187.

July 20, 1887.
 Hunter,
 Walker, & Co.
 v. Falkirk
 Iron Co.

The respondents reclaimed, and argued;—The design was not novel, which it must be to be registered,¹ but had been anticipated by the device of the Messrs Crosthwaite. The door included what was claimed here as a novelty, viz., the moulding being continuous from end to end of the range, and the fact that the door fell downwards did not constitute an essential difference. Such mouldings were common on wooden articles,—e.g., sideboards,—and any wooden article with metal hinges might be registered under Class I. of the Board of Trade rules. The public were not entitled to know for what purpose the design was registered; they could only know that a design was registered under the statute; they could not see the application, and if a moulding such as this was common on other articles it was not novel within the whole of Class I., which it ought to be. If that was not the limit, what was? Certainly not the terms of the application, because the public could not ask to see that. The design here registered, assuming its novelty and its utility, should have been made the subject of a patent, and was not suitable for registration as a design. The contrivance was a mechanical device for excluding air from the top of the fire, and for doing away with the diminution of radiation from the front of the fire when the fall-bar, with a moulding attached to it, was down. The word “design” was not intended to cover such mechanical contrivances. There was no statutory definition of the word design, except that in section 60 of the Act, which merely said that professing to have any special knowledge of such matters, I may safely affirm that, in the taste or fashion at the present time, constructive design is very much in favour with the makers of furniture and articles of domestic use. Instead of overlaying their goods with ornament which has no particular relation to the structure, or part of the structure to which it is to be applied, our designers aim rather at neatness or elegance in the lines that enter into the form of the object, or are appropriate to it. In a kitchen range a plain moulding carried out broadly may be better taste than more elaborate ornament. In any view, it is an application of an idea or mode of treatment (a very elementary one it may be) to an object and in a way which is new as regards the particular application. There is evidence that the complainers’ design was immediately recognised as an improvement by the trade, and the fact that the respondents are selling the same thing (which I hold to be proved) is good evidence against them on the question of the worth of the design. In such circumstances, I am not much impressed with the argument that this is not a design entitled to copyright protection. It is said that such a thing does not fall within any of the ordinary categories of invention; that it was ‘in the air,’ and that if the suspenders had not brought it out, other makers would. The fact that several makers were thinking about something, which one of them was the first to register, is, to my mind, evidence that the thing registered is a design. It is apparently not a subject for which a patent could be obtained; and on the other hand, it is not a mere unmeaning combination of known devices. Between these limits I think the designer may get protection for any variety of intelligent form or pattern capable of being applied to the kind of goods for which he seeks a certificate. In the present case, we have such an intelligent combination adapted to objects falling under Class I. The merit of the invention, such as it is, consists in pleasing the purchaser’s eye, and has nothing to do with the uses of the grate or the processes of cooking. I am therefore of opinion that this is not a subject for protection by patent, and that it is entitled to the copyright protection which the certificate purports to grant.

“I have not referred particularly to the authorities cited, but I have considered them; and I conceive that the judgment to be pronounced is supported by the decisions.”

¹ Lazarus v. Charles, 1873, L. R., 16 Eq. 117; Adams v. Clementson, 1879, L. R. 12 Chan. Div. 714; Mulloney v. Stevens, 1864, 10 L. T. 190; Le May v. Welch, 1884, L. R., 28 Chan. Div. 24.

"design" meant "any design applicable to any article," substance, or thing therein referred to, but there were cases in which the word had been interpreted, and this did not fall within the interpretation.¹ Further, a design to be registered must be complete within itself, and not merely a part of a whole, only useful or ornamental in connection with some other part which was not registered. Further, there was nothing on the face of the design to shew which part of the door was registered, and as the public could get no access to the application they were entitled to believe that it was for the shape of the lance hinges or any other part of the door depicted on the design that the certificate was granted.

No. 187.

July 20, 1887.
Hunter,
Walker, & Co.
v. Falkirk
Iron Co.

Argued for the complainers;—The designer of any design was entitled to the benefit of his invention provided he went through the forms prescribed by the statute. If the statute had not provided the public with the means of ascertaining what was registered, and for what purpose it was registered, that was the fault of the statute, and the designer when his design was infringed ought to be allowed to prove by evidence for what purpose the registration was made. This door was novel as applied to any article in Class I., and the reclaimers had failed to prove that it was not. The design might have been a perfectly good subject for a patent, but that did not bar it from being a good subject for registration as a design. The registration was for shape and configuration, but applied for purposes partly of utility and partly of ornament. It had been settled that such a design was a suitable subject for registration.²

At advising Lord Shand delivered the opinion of the Court,—

LORD SHAND.—The pursuers, Messrs Walker, Hunter, and Company, of the Port Downie Iron Works, Falkirk, have raised this action to vindicate their alleged right of copyright in a registered design for kitchen-range fire-doors, and the Lord Ordinary by the judgment complained of has affirmed the existence of the right they claim. The defenders, the Falkirk Iron Company, have maintained under the reclaiming note presented by them that no such right exists, and the main contention presented on their behalf is that the alleged design is not a proper subject of registration and certificate—that the provisions of Part III. of the Patents, Designs, and Trade-Marks Act of 1883 (46 and 47 Vict. cap. 57), which relates to the registration of designs, do not confer an exclusive privilege or copyright in such a matter as that forming the subject of the pursuers' claim, and that the exclusive privilege claimed, if novelty and utility can be established, can only be obtained by means of letters-patent taken out in terms of the first part of the statute.

The question raised is one of importance, and is not free from difficulty. By sec. 47 of the statute the design to be protected must be a "new or original design not previously published in the United Kingdom." The alleged novelty of the pursuers' kitchen-range fire-door, which is not admitted, consists in its shape—in having a moulding on the top of the door corresponding to and fitting into the moulding in front of the hob of the range when the door is closed; and assuming that such a design applicable to a kitchen range is a good subject of copyright, it seems to me that sufficient novelty has been made out to sustain the right. It is true that doors having mouldings along the top corresponding with and fitting into the article of which they form part have been in

¹ Harrison v. Taylor, 1859, 4 H. & N. 815; Reg. v. Bessell, 1851, L. R., 16 Q. B. 810; Windover v. Smith, 1863, 32 Beav. 200.

² Rogers v. Driver, 1850, 16 Q. B. 102.

No. 187. use in wooden articles of furniture, such as sideboards, cupboard, and the like, but the evidence appears to shew that until it occurred to the pursuers, with a view to secure special advantages, to have fire-range doors so made, this had not been done by any others in the trade. The moulding on fire-ranges was in use to be fixed to the top or fire-cover of the grate or to the fall-bar, and the door which closed immediately below had no moulding, but was closed against the end of the grate immediately below the moulding on the cover or fall-bar.

July 20, 1887.
Hunter,
Walker, & Co.
v. Falkirk
Iron Co.

I do not think it necessary to go into the evidence on the point of novelty. It seems to be quite clear that the defenders' workmen first got the idea of adopting the shape which the pursuers introduced from having seen one of the pursuers' designs, and though there is some evidence by two witnesses of the name of Crosthwaite that they used a somewhat similar design, I think the shape of the door described by them, which opened downwards, was essentially different; while as regards the stoves spoken to by some other witnesses, the moulding extended round the whole door, and did not correspond or fit into the rest of the article as the fire-door of the pursuers does into the fire-cover or hob of the grate, so as to make one continuous moulding. It may be quite true that it did not require a great degree of originality to suggest or mature the design which the pursuers claim as new, because doors of a similar shape or moulding had been used in articles of wooden manufacture. But unquestionably on the evidence the pursuers were the first to think of and apply the design in the making of a fire-door for a kitchen range, and I think there is sufficient novelty to sustain the design as a subject of copyright.

Now, undoubtedly the adoption of this shape, which I call new on the grounds just explained, has been found to be attended with some important advantages. When the door had no such moulding (1) an open space or slit was left for the length of the fire-grate, through which cold air was admitted to the upper side of the fire; and (2) the fire-cover having the moulding on it was heavy, and inconvenience was found in lifting it off, while if the moulding was put on the fall-bar and became part of it, as was frequently the case in the later manufacture, it intercepted the heat and prevented the benefit of the full radiation being got in front of the fire. The use of the new shape results in the removal of these disadvantages, and yet preserves a symmetrical if not ornamental form.

Assuming the novelty of the design to be made out, the points of the defenders' argument, as stated, appear to be (1) that as the design serves the useful objects now explained, it should properly speaking be made the subject of a patent; and farther (2) that under the branch of the statute relating to designs you cannot have a registered design of an article not complete and independent in itself, but which is to be used in combination with an article to which it is to be attached. I shall deal with these points separately.

In regard to the first of these it is to be observed that the statute does not profess to give any definition of a design which may be the subject of copyright. Section 60 declares that design "means any design," without defining the meaning of the term, and then goes on, "applicable to any article of manufacture," &c., "whether the design is applicable for the pattern, or for the shape or configuration, or for the ornament thereof, or for any two or more of such purposes." Now, it is quite true that the subject of registration must not be an article of manufacture itself, but a design to be applied to an article of manufacture or substance for the pattern, shape, or ornament; and also that the statute in that branch of it which relates to the registration of designs does not afford or profess to afford protection to any mechanical principle or contrivance directly. The Act in this branch gives protection only to the shape or configuration, or to the design for the shape or configuration, in such a case as the present.

No. 187.
July 20, 1887.
Hunter,
Walker, & Co.
v. Falkirk
Iron Co.

The result of such protection may be, however, to secure important advantages such as attend a mechanical contrivance, if these advantages should be the result directly or indirectly of the shape or configuration adopted. Thus in the present case the new shape of fire-range door, with the moulding as part of it, has the particular advantages over the old shape of door which I have already noticed. These are not directly the subject of protection, but inasmuch as they are dependent on and inseparable from the shape or configuration, they are indirectly secured by the registration of the design. It may be quite true that in place of registering the design for its shape, and so gaining protection for a period of five years, the pursuers might rather have applied for letters-patent, with protection for the longer period of fourteen years for improvements in the manufacture of doors for convertible fire-ranges, and have made not the mere shape, but the mechanical action and contrivance, the subject of protection by letters-patent. But assuming that such letters-patent might have been obtained, and that there was novelty not only sufficient to validate the registration of a design but to create an effectual patent, this would not in my opinion lead to the result that the design was not a proper subject for registration. I observe that in Mr Coppinger's excellent work on the Law of Copyright (p. 447), when treating of the provisions of the Statute 6 and 7 Vict. c. 65, sec. 3, he observes,—"It appears to be the received opinion that under this clause may be registered designs, the subjects of which could in many cases have obtained a patent." And in the case of Rogers (1850), 16 Q. B. 108, an opinion to that effect was given by the learned Judges, and specially by Justices Coleridge and Yule. The words of the statute then under consideration were these—"Any new or original design for any article of manufacture having reference to some purpose of utility, so far as such design shall be for the shape or configuration." These are very much the words in the present Act, having this difference only, that it is not necessary now to shew that the shape of the registered design will serve a useful purpose. So I am of opinion that the registration of the design in this case, for its shape or configuration is effectual, securing as it does advantages directly resulting from the shape, and that even though the pursuers could have obtained letters-patent for improvements in the manufacture of fire-range doors which would have secured these advantages as an exclusive privilege.

I am further of opinion that the defenders' contention that a design cannot be made the subject of registration if it relate to or depict not an article complete in itself, but one which is to be used in combination with and as part of another article of manufacture, as, e.g., a design of a door as specially applicable to and in connection with a fire-range, is unsound. The language of sections 60 and 57 and 58 appears to me to make this clear, for in these sections the design is described as applicable to any article of manufacture, and the exhibiting of "a design, or of any article to which a design is applied," in certain circumstances is declared to be no bar to subsequent registration of the design, and the infringement of copyright is prohibited by exposing for sale any article of manufacture, or any substance to which a registered design, or any fraudulent imitation thereof, shall have been applied. All of these provisions recognise the

- No. 187. existence of a protected design to be applied to an article of manufacture to which it may be attached, and of which it becomes a part.
- July 20, 1887. Hunter, Walker, & Co. v. Falkirk Iron Co. It was further maintained for the defenders that the registration of the design in question was ineffectual, because it did not carry on its face in some way the announcement that it was registered for the shape only; that third parties were entitled to assume that the registration was for the ornament in connection with the hinge, and gave no protection to the shape. The pursuers themselves, in the door which they now make, have adopted a different ornament in connection with a change they have made in the form of the hinge. I am clearly of opinion that this objection is not well founded. When an infringement of copyright is complained of, all that the alleged infringer is entitled to see is the registered design, either as it may be found in the form of the article itself, as, e.g., an actual door of the fire-range in this case, or it may be the design and relative certificate which is in the hands of the owner of the copyright. The statute does not authorise him to demand inspection of the register itself from the comptroller until the copyright has ceased, as is clear from section 52 of the statute. No specification by the author of the design is required (or indeed allowed) as in the case of patents for inventions, and there is no register to which the alleged infringer can go, as in the case of infringement of a patent, in order to ascertain whether the act complained of can properly be characterised as an infringement, with reference to the purpose or object for which the design has been registered, whether for the pattern, the shape, or the ornament. In this state of matters it seems to me of necessity to follow, and it must have been intended, that the purpose for which the design was registered may be proved by evidence when any question arises on the subject,—primarily the evidence of the owner who made the registration, but tested by that of others acquainted with the trade and manufacture or business in the articles to which the design related. It will be found that many, probably the large majority, of designs are self-interpreting without such evidence, but there must be others in which a question may be raised, which, however, in most instances, will be easily settled as soon as evidence is adduced. Thus, e.g., in the present case, evidence having been fully led, no one has seriously suggested on the proof, in which persons acquainted with the trade have been examined, that the pursuers' design was or could be registered for any of the purposes authorised by the statute except its shape or configuration, attended as that shape is with useful results. A person alleged to be an infringer is quite entitled to demand of the person complaining that he shall state for what purpose or purposes under the statute the design was registered, and if he be dissatisfied with the answer he may under legal proceedings have such an inquiry as has taken place on that question in this case with reference to the pursuers' design. He may in that inquiry be able to shew that the complainer is seeking to use the certificate of registration of the design for a purpose and to an effect which is not warranted by the design either as self-interpreting or as interpreted by the evidence where there is a question, and in that case he may succeed in his defence. I do not think it is possible to read the enactment of the statute, which leaves matters, and obviously designedly leaves matters, without special provisions on this subject, in any other way. For the only other reading would result in this, that where any design had a special or peculiar shape with some ornament, however slight, and was consequently registered on account of the shape, an infringer would be enabled to defeat the copyright by merely alleging that the design registered for shape was protected only No. 187.

as regards the ornament, or that the object of registration was doubtful, and so the registration was ineffectual, and that evidence could not be admitted on the July 20, 1887.
subject. Such an interpretation of the statute would lead to the result that in Hunter, the great majority of designs for which the statute obviously is intended to give Walker, & Co.
protection no such protection could be given. This view of the statute does not v. Falkirk recommend itself, and is not in my opinion to be adopted. It seems to me Iron Co.
that in order to give reasonable effect to the statute the claim or representation of the pursuer in such cases not only may be the subject of evidence such as we have in this case, but may further be solved by an easy and certain test. The statute (section 47, subsection 3) provides that the application for registration "must contain a statement of the nature of the design" as well as of the class or classes of goods in which the applicant desires that the design be registered.
This infers that the applicant shall state the purpose or object for which the design is to be registered,—pattern, shape, or ornament,—and accordingly in the Board of Trade rules issued in virtue of the statute it is provided by rule 9 that the application "shall, in describing the nature of the design, state whether it is applicable for the pattern, or for the shape or configuration of the design." I see no reason to doubt that when a controversy on this subject arises in judicial proceedings for alleged infringements of the design, and it becomes necessary to determine whether protection was given to the design for its pattern, shape, or ornament, "or for any two or more of such purposes," either party may refer to the application for registration for a definition or description of the purpose of the registration, and the Court will where necessary order the evidence on this subject to be produced, and such evidence should go far to decide the controversy. In the present case it is proved that the application was for a design for a "range fire-door with moulding on top, moulding forming front of range.
Shape to be registered." This piece of evidence by itself, and even more strongly if regard be had to the other evidence in the case, makes it clear that the pursuers' design was registered not for any mere matter of ornament in connection with the form of hinges of the door or otherwise, but without reference to ornament, solely for its shape in connection especially with the moulding on the top, which has material advantages.

I am of opinion that the pursuers' design was novel, that the design was registered for its shape or configuration, that it was a proper subject for registration and certificate under the statute, and as the design was clearly copied by the defenders the alleged infringement has been made out. On these grounds, though differing in some respects from the views of the Lord Ordinary, I am of opinion that his Lordship's judgment should be affirmed.

THE COURT adhered.

AULD & MACDONALD, W.S.—J. & J. ROSS, W.S.—Agents.

JOHN T. MACLAGAN (Collector of Ministers' Widows' Fund), First Party. No. 188.
—Murray—C. S. Dickson.

REVEREND WILLIAM M. BROWN, Second Party.—Pearson—Wallace.

July 20, 1887.
MacLagan v.
Brown.

Church—Ministers' Widows' Fund—Chapel of Ease—Contributor—Statute.
—Held that a minister of a chapel of ease, which had been built by private subscription, on being inducted to the same church after its erection into a quoad

No. 188. sacra church, was entitled and bound to become a contributor to the Ministers' Widows' Fund.

July 20, 1887. MacLagan v. Brown. Observations on Grant v. Macintyre, July 14, 1849, 11 D. 1370.

1ST DIVISION.
M.

THE CHURCH OF ST MARGARET'S, Dumbiedykes, Edinburgh, was built in 1881 by private subscription as a chapel of ease in connection with the Church of Scotland, and on 17th October of that year the trustees of the church wrote to the Reverend William M. Brown, "At a meeting of the trustees, held this forenoon, it was agreed to offer you the charge as minister of Dumbiedykes Church. We guarantee you a yearly stipend of £150 for the first three years, the grant from the Home Mission in addition." Mr Brown was at that date an ordained minister of the Church of Scotland, but not a parish minister. The cost of salaries to the church officials, and of maintaining the ordinances of the church were defrayed by the trustees, the income derived from seat-rents and collections being appropriated to meet the stipend and other expenses.

The Presbytery having approved of these arrangements and of Mr Brown's appointment, he entered upon his duties as minister of the church.

In March 1885 the trustees of the church presented a petition to the Presbytery of Edinburgh, setting forth that they were about to apply to the Court of Teinds for the erection of the church, with a suitable district attached, into a church and parish quoad sacra, in terms of the Act 7 and 8 Vict. cap. 44, and they therewith submitted a draft of a constitution for the Presbytery's sanction and approval. Article 15 of the constitution proposed,—“That the Rev. William Morris Brown, M.A., shall be recognised and received by the Presbytery of the bounds as the first minister of the new church and parish as soon as possible after decree of disjunction has been pronounced by the Court of Teinds, whom failing, the appointment of the first minister shall be made by the said trustees or their successors.”

Decree of disjunction and erection was pronounced by the Teind Court on 12th July 1886, and Mr Brown was inducted to the new parish on 25th August 1886.

A question having thereafter arisen as to the right and duty of Mr Brown to become a contributor to the Ministers' Widows' Fund, a special case was presented to the Court by the collector of the fund as first party, and by Mr Brown as second party, which embodied the above facts, and put this question,—“Is the party of the second part bound and entitled to become a contributor to the Ministers' Widows' Fund?”

It was stated at the bar that in practice the case of Grant had always been held to apply to cases similar to the present, and that there were 122 ministers in the same position as Mr Brown.

There was this further statement in the case,—“In the case of Grant v. Macintyre, 14th July 1849 (reported 11 D. 1370), it was found, in conformity with the opinion of the majority of the whole Court, ‘that ministers ordained or admitted to the charge of any church and district, after the same shall have been erected into a church and parish quoad sacra under authority of the Statute 7 and 8 Vict. cap. 44, are bound and entitled to become contributors to the Ministers' Widows' Fund,* but find that parties holding the charge of any church and district so erected, but who have been appointed to the same before the date of such erection, are not bound or entitled to become contributors to the said Fund.’ In view of said decision, the party of the first part contends that the party of the second part had been appointed as minister of the Church of St Margaret's, Dumbiedykes, before said church was erected into a church and parish quoad sacra, and that he is consequently neither bound nor entitled to become a contributor to the fund. The party of the second part contends that he was not appointed to the same until after the date of the said erection, and that he is bound and entitled to be a contributor to the said fund." No. 188. July 20, 1887. MacLagan v. Brown.

* The Ministers' Widows' Fund Act (54 Geo. III. cap. 169) provided that “every minister who was possessed of a benefice in the Church of Scotland” should be entitled to participate in the fund.

The first party argued;—The decision in the case of *Grant*¹ ruled this case. On the face of the proceedings, it was clear that Mr Brown was admitted minister in 1881. Further, by the constitution drawn up in 1885, he was in terms "recognised" "as the first minister of the new church and parish." Admission was equivalent to ordination. If, therefore, the Presbytery had declined to approve of the subsequent proceedings in 1886, they could not have done so otherwise than by libelling Mr Brown's life or doctrine. The question was a very serious one,—involving large pecuniary interests, looking to the number of ministers who were affected by it,—and that being so, the practice which had always been followed by the church in regard to it was most important. It was suggested that the 1881 appointment was merely temporary, but that was not so. It was no doubt true that the stipend was guaranteed for three years only in the first instance, but that was immaterial. Further, a parish was not an essential of the status of a minister, so as to entitle him to claim the benefit of the Widows' Fund.² Ministers of parliamentary churches were in the same position as Mr Brown, and the two cases were parallel.³

The second party argued;—When Mr Brown was first appointed in 1881, it was to a chapel of ease only, which was in no sense a benefice. He was not even appointed ad vitam aut culpam, but only under a contract of employment, which guaranteed him payment of a certain stipend for three years. The position of a minister of a chapel of ease fell, in this respect, below that of a minister of a parliamentary church. In the latter case it was the Crown which appointed, a district was set aside and attached to the church, and a stipend was provided out of public funds. In the present case the stipend was provided by private subscription, and there was no district to which Mr Brown could be admitted until after the erection. It was, therefore, only in a subsidiary sense that Mr Brown could be said to be appointed prior to the decree of the Teind Court, and for the purposes of the present question his appointment was simultaneous with the erection of the parish. Prior to that he was a mere missionary. The decision in the case of Grant must be read with reference to the case which was then being dealt with. There was nothing to be found in the opinions of the Judges in that case to the effect that a minister of a chapel of ease was disqualified from contributing to the Widows' Fund when he subsequently became minister of a quoad sacra parish. Nor was there anything in the terms of the Ministers' Widows' Fund Act (54 Geo. III. cap. 169) to lead to such a result.

LORD PRESIDENT.—The second party to this case is the minister of the church and parish quoad sacra of St Margaret's, Dumbiedykes, and prima facie he is

¹ Grant v. Macintyre, July 14, 1849, 11 D. 1370, 21 Scot. Jur. 567.

² Gordon v. Trustees of the Widows' Fund, Feb. 18, 1836, 14 S. 509, Nov. 15, 1836, 15 S. 15; Act 7 and 8 Vict. cap. 44, sec. 13.

³ Irvine v. Trustees of Ministers' Widows' Fund, May 24, 1838, 16 S. 1024; Cheynes v. Magistrates of Dundee, June 27, 1866, 1 Macph. 963.

No. 188.

July 20, 1887.
MacLagan v.
Brown.

entitled and bound to be a contributor to the Ministers' Widows' Fund, because all persons admitted to a benefice of that description are held by judgments of this Court to be so entitled. But it is maintained by the first party that Mr Brown is not entitled and not bound to contribute, because he was formerly minister of a church which has now, along with a certain district, been erected into a parish quoad sacra. That contention is rested upon the decision of the Court in the case of Grant v. Macintyre (11 D. 1370). I am of opinion that the question put to the Court must be answered in the affirmative, and that Mr Brown having been admitted to a quoad sacra church and parish is entitled and bound to contribute to the fund.

The circumstances of the case are very simple. The church in question was erected by private subscription, and although it was recognised by the Presbytery as in communion with the Church of Scotland, it had no other status than that of a chapel of ease erected by the benevolence of some gentlemen in the district. The trustees or subscribers applied to Mr Brown in 1881, and offered him the appointment of minister. The terms of the appointment were set forth in a letter which they wrote to Mr Brown, offering him the charge and a yearly stipend of £150 for the first three years, apart from the grant from the Home Mission Scheme of the Church. They further informed him that a meeting of the committee appointed by the Presbytery was to be held on the Friday following, before which date they desired to have his answer. The answer was favourable, the meeting of the Presbytery committee was held, and it was agreed that Mr Brown should be appointed minister on the terms expressed in the offer.

I pause here for the purpose of considering the nature of the relation which subsisted between the trustees for the subscribers and Mr Brown. The church of which Mr Brown was appointed the minister belonged to the subscribers; the property never was transferred to anyone else; Mr Brown was selected to officiate as minister, and as he happened to be an ordained minister it was not necessary that he should be ordained again. The relation subsisting between them was therefore that of parties to a mutual contract of employment. In consideration of services to be rendered by Mr Brown, the trustees guaranteed him remuneration at the rate of £150 for three years. That was the whole arrangement between them,—no doubt it was carried through with the sanction of the Presbytery, and quite rightly so, because the church was intended to be in communion with the Church of Scotland.

When it was subsequently agreed to apply to the Court of Teinds for the purpose of having the church along with a suitable district erected into a quoad sacra parish, the trustees availed themselves of the provisions of the 8th section of the Act 7 and 8 Vict. cap. 44, and offered their church as the church of the new parish. Mr Brown's new position was essentially different from that held by him as minister of the chapel of ease, because now he had a permanent endowment secured to him under the 8th section of the Act to which I have referred. He was no longer dependent upon a contract of employment. On the contrary a stipend of a certain amount fell to be secured to him to the satisfaction of the Court, and it is further provided by the Act that in the event of the stipend being of a certain amount a manse should be inalienably attached to the benefice, and provision made for its upkeep. The church and its appurtenances also fell to be transferred to the new parish, and the maintenance of the whole ecclesiastical buildings had to be provided for by a permanent endowment. That put an end to the chapel of ease, because it was handed over No. 188.

to the new parish, and a deed of constitution was arranged with the General July 20, 1887.
Assembly, or its committee, and the original subscribers as to the way in which MacLagan v.
the church should be managed after the decree of erection was obtained. Brown.
Among other things the constitution provided that Mr Brown should be appointed the first minister of the newly erected church and parish. It appears to me that when the Presbytery, after the decree of erection had been obtained, proceeded to induct Mr Brown into the new quoad sacra church and parish, they were acting with perfect regularity and propriety,—for he had never previously been admitted to a benefice.

Accordingly, the case appears to be very clear, if it were not for the argument which has been founded upon the case of Grant v. Macintyre (11 D. 1370). It has been strongly contended by the Collector of the Widows' Fund that the position of the minister of a parliamentary charge is on all-fours with that of Mr Brown as the minister of a chapel of ease. But it appears to me to be essentially different. When Mr Macintyre was admitted to a parliamentary church and district, he was admitted once for all to a church and benefice. The decree of erection quoad sacra,—when subsequently obtained,—simply altered his position as minister of the benefice, but it did not lead to any new admission. The only admission was the original one to the parliamentary church and district. His status was altered, and he became possessed of all the powers of a parish minister, but his stipend, manse, and rights in connection therewith remained as before. His office was the same as it had been, except that his powers and privileges were enlarged. Accordingly, we must look to the fact, on the one hand, that Mr Macintyre had been admitted to a parliamentary church and district prior to the decree of erection in his case, and, on the other hand, that Mr Brown had never been admitted to any office or benefice in the church until he was admitted to the quoad sacra church and benefice of St Margaret's. In Mr Macintyre's case, no one could have prevented him from continuing to occupy the district church and manse. His position as regards his civil rights in connection with the benefice remained the same after as before the decree of erection. In Mr Brown's case it is different. Prior to the decree of erection he had no other connection with the chapel of ease than that he was employed to conduct service there, and the trustees and subscribers might have limited his contract of employment in any way they pleased. The guarantee for £150 of stipend was a mere private arrangement. There was no security or endowment, and there was no payment or anything else to which he was entitled by virtue of his office.

Such being the state of the facts, and there being the differences I have pointed out between the present case and that of Macintyre, it is not necessary to say much about the terms of the statute. But a short reference to these will make the case more clear. Every minister who is admitted to a benefice becomes thereby entitled and bound to become a contributor to the Widows' Fund, but that is only when he is admitted to a benefice. It surely cannot be said that he is admitted to a benefice when he is appointed to a chapel of ease with a personal guarantee of stipend limited to three years. There is no benefice there. No doubt a parliamentary minister is not considered in the proper sense to hold a benefice when he is appointed and inducted, but at anyrate he is appointed to a permanent office, and although a decree of the Teind Court alters materially the character of the district and church, and the minister's

No. 188.

July 20, 1887.
MacLagan v.
Brown.

status and powers, it in no way affects his title to remain there, which was secured to him when he was presented and inducted.

I think there is a clear distinction between this case and that of Macintyre, and that Mr Brown having been now duly inducted is entitled and bound to become a contributor to the Widows' Fund.

LORD MURE.—I am of the same opinion, and I have little to add. Mr Brown is now admittedly minister of the quoad sacra parish and church of Dumbiedykes, erected under decree of the Court of Teinds in 1886, and that being so, he was, I think, ex facie of this position, entitled and bound to become a contributor to the Ministers' Widows' Fund. It has, however, been argued by the first party that this contention must fail, because of the judgment in the case of Grant (11 D. 1370), in which it is said to have been laid down that ministers who have held the charge of a quoad sacra church or district before the date of its erection under the statute were not entitled to become contributors to the fund; and that this was the position of the second party in the present case. Now, assuming that to have been so decided in the case of Grant, which is, I think, doubtful, it appears to me that the circumstances of this case are not such as can bring it under any such rule. Because there was not, as I conceive, anything in the arrangements under which the second party officiated in that church, prior to the erection of the quoad sacra parish, which can be held to have disqualified him from becoming a contributor to the Widows' Fund in respect of the decision in Grant's case. There was no district attached to his ministry before the date of erection in 1886 equivalent to a district or parish; but he was simply the minister of a chapel of ease, and not the minister of a quoad sacra district. I therefore agree with your Lordship.

LORD ADAM.—It is quite clear to my mind that Mr Brown was admitted to be minister of the quoad sacra parish and church of Dumbiedykes for the first time in 1885. Before that time he was only minister of a chapel of ease, which is not a benefice in any sense. I think the case is quite clear, and I should not have seen any difficulty except for the case of Grant. But upon consideration, I do not think the two cases are identical, or even similar.

LORD SHAND was absent.

THE COURT accordingly answered the question in the affirmative.

INGLIS & ALLAN, W.S.—MACKENZIE & BLACK, W.S.—Agents.

No. 189.

July 20, 1887.
Foulis v.
Fairbairn.

MRS E. W. MOFFAT OR FOULIS, Pursuer (Reclaimers).—Salvesen.
F. S. FAIRBAIRN, Defender (Respondent).—Murray—Watt.

Aliment—Mother and Son-in-law—Amount.—Held (following Moir v. Reid, 4 Macph. 1060), that a husband is bound to contribute to the aliment of his wife's mother when her circumstances are such as to entitle her to aliment from her children.

Aliment.—Circumstances in which a widow, unable to support herself, was held entitled to aliment from her children at the rate of £40 per annum.

1st DIVISION.
Lord Lee.
B.

MRS E. W. MOFFAT OR FOULIS, residing at Hastings, widow of the late Robert Foulis, raised this action against F. S. Fairbairn, solicitor, Gala-shiels, her eldest daughter's husband, concluding that the defender should be ordained to make payment to the pursuer of the sum of £40 yearly, or such other sum as our said Lords shall determine to be fair and reasonable, No. 189.

as his proportion of a contribution to the aliment to which the pursuer is entitled from the members of her family "during the joint lives of the July 20, 1887.
pursuer and defender." Foulis v.
Fairbairn.

The pursuer (in a record amended in the Inner-House), averred that she was the widow of the late Robert Foulis, head master of the New Plymouth High School, New Zealand, who died on 21st July 1885, and that since her husband's death she had been in very poor circumstances, and was now dependent for her maintenance upon the contributions of such of her family as were able to assist her. She stated that her eldest son Dr Foulis, a medical practitioner in England, was the only member of her family (other than the defender) who was able to contribute to her support, and that he had done so, and was willing to contribute a sum equal to that for which the defender might be found liable in the present action.

The defender denied, inter alia, that Dr Foulis was the only member of the family, other than his wife, who was in a position to assist the pursuer, and stated that she was in receipt of a sum of £52 per annum for personal maintenance from Dr Foulis, and that accordingly he declined to pay.

The pursuer pleaded;—The defender being bound to aliment the pursuer, his mother-in-law, and the sum sued for being fair and reasonable as his proportion of the aliment to which the pursuer is entitled from the members of her family, she is entitled to decree in terms of the conclusions, with expenses.

The defender pleaded;—(1) The statements of the pursuer are irrelevant, and insufficient to support the conclusions of the summons. (2) The pursuer not being indigent, the present action ought to be dismissed. (3) The defender being only the son-in-law of the pursuer, is not liable to aliment the pursuer, or, at least, is not liable to contribute to the aliment furnished for her by her own children.

The Lord Ordinary (Lee), on 27th May 1887, pronounced this interlocutor:—"Finds it not disputed that the pursuer is in receipt of aliment from a son at the rate of £52 per annum; and finds that the allegations on record are not relevant and sufficient to support the conclusions of the present action: Therefore dismisses the action, and decerns," &c.

The pursuer reclaimed.

The Court then allowed a proof, which was taken before Lord Shand. It appeared from the evidence that only two of Mrs Foulis' children, viz., Dr Foulis and Mrs Fairbairn, were in a position to contribute to her support; that since the end of 1886 she had been endeavouring to get employment, such as she could undertake, but without success. Dr Littlejohn who was examined for the defender, deponed that Mrs Foulis, although weakly, was suffering from no disease. He added,—“I think she is not fit for manual work, or for going upstairs; but I think she might act as a companion, or keep lodgers with the aid of servants.”

The pursuer deponed that she was the daughter of the late T. M. Moffat, S.S.C. and S.L., and that prior to her marriage she had done nothing to support herself, that her husband had been seven years head master of James Gillespie's School in Edinburgh, that in consequence of his health breaking down he went to New Zealand in 1877, and that at the time of his death he was rector of the New Plymouth High School there.

The pursuer argued;—Upon the evidence it was in vain for the defender to say Mrs Foulis could earn anything. It was further proved that Dr Foulis and Mrs Fairbairn alone of her children were able to support her. It was settled that a son-in-law was bound to contribute to the aliment

No. 189. of his mother-in-law, and the defender was therefore liable.¹ As to the amount of aliment, the £40 given in *Thom v. Mackenzie*² was less than the Court should award, now that the expense of living was greater.

July 20, 1887.
Foulis v.
Fairbairn.

The defender argued ;—There was nothing in the physical condition of the pursuer to prevent her from earning her livelihood. She was not therefore “indigent,” and had no claim for maintenance against others.³ In the case of Mackenzie,³ the question of Mrs Mackenzie’s indigence was not determined, owing to the judicial offer which was made. But besides proving indigence on her own part, the pursuer was bound to prove superfluity on the defender’s part.⁴ (LORD PRESIDENT.—But there is no averment or plea to that effect.)

Besides Moir v. Reid, which found a son-in-law liable to support his mother-in-law, was not well decided.⁵ Due weight was not given in that case to the opinions of the Judges in the case of *Macdonald*⁶ to the effect that a son-in-law was not liable to support his father-in-law.

As to the amount, Mackenzie’s case² ought to be followed.

LORD PRESIDENT.—It is not in our power to review the judgment which was pronounced in the case of Moir v. Reid, 4 Macph. 1060. It was a unanimous judgment, and I still remain of opinion that it was a sound one. Accordingly, on the assumption that the son of the pursuer and her daughter, as represented by her husband the defender, are equally liable to support the pursuer, the only question which we have to decide is the amount which they are to contribute. I am not disposed to go beyond the sum which the Court judged to be sufficient in the case of Thom, 3 Macph. 177. That case was a very fair precedent for Mr Murray to found upon, and therefore I think we shall do justice to the pursuer if we decern against the defender for the one-half of £40, the other half being provided by Dr Foulis.

LORD MURE concurred.

LORD SHAND.—The case of Moir v. Reid was decided in 1866 and we are now in 1887, and your Lordship has pointed out that the judgment was a unanimous one. But, if the matter which was there decided could have been opened up, I should not have regretted it, for I have always entertained considerable doubts as to the soundness of the judgment. Although in the general case a husband when he marries incurs liability for his wife’s debts, I think that in a case like the present there is room for saying that that general principle does not apply.

Otherwise, I agree that £40 is a sufficient sum to award to the pursuer.

LORD ADAM concurred.

THE COURT pronounced this interlocutor :—“The Lords decern against the defender for payment of aliment to the pursuer at the rate of £20 per annum as his contribution towards the support of the pursuer, and that half-yearly, beginning the first ¹ Moir v. Reid, July 13, 1866, 4 Macph. 1060, 38 Scot. Jur. 551 ; Laidlaw v. Laidlaw, July 3, 1832, 10 S. 745.

² Thom v. Mackenzie, Dec. 2, 1864, 3 Macph. 177, 37 Scot. Jur. 86.

³ Erskine’s Inst. i. 6, 56.

⁴ Hamilton v. Hamilton, March 20, 1877, 4 R. 688.

⁵ Fraser on Parent and Child, 115.

⁶ Macdonald v. Macdonald, June 20, 1846, 8 D. 830.

term's payment at Martinmas 1886: Find the pursuer entitled No. 189. to expenses," &c.

STURROCK & GRAHAM, W.S.—THOMAS DALGLEISH, S.S.C.—Agents.

July 20, 1887.
Foulis v.
Fairbairn.

THE MARQUIS OF HUNTLY AND OTHERS, Pursuers.—Pearson.
THE EARL OF FIFE, Defender.—Balfour—Lorimer.

No. 190.

July 20, 1887.*
Marquis of Huntly v.
Earl of Fife.

Superior and Vassal—Conveyancing Act, 1874 (37 and 38 Vict. c. 94), sec. 4, subsecs. 1 and 3—Implied entry—Trustees for payment of debts.—Held by Lord Kinnear, Ordinary, that the infestment of trustees under a trust-disposition for payment of certain debts, containing a power of sale, and an obligation on the trustees to reconvey when the trust purposes were satisfied, did not divest the granter of the disposition of the feudal fee, and that the implied entry obtained by the trustees by recording the disposition did not entitle the superior to a casualty.

THE present Marquis of Huntly was served heir of tailzie and provision to his father, the late Marquis, by decree of special service, dated 1st November 1866, and he was infest by recording the decree in the General Register of Sasines on 5th December 1866. OUTER-HOUSE
Lord Kinnear.

On 9th June 1882 the Marquis conveyed to certain persons as trustees the lands of Davoch and Inverenzie, for payment of certain debts. The deed gave the trustees the same powers of sale as were possessed by the granter, and contained an obligation on the trustees to reconvey when the trust purposes were satisfied.

The trustees were infest by recording the disposition on 21st June 1882. The superior, the Earl of Fife, demanded a composition from the trustees in respect of the implied entry.

The Marquis of Huntly and the trustees raised an action against the Earl of Fife, concluding to have it found and declared (1) that the Marquis as proprietor of the lands of Davoch and Inverenzie was duly entered with the said defender as superior in these lands; (2) that the pursuers were liable only in payment of relief-duty of one penny Scots, and that no further composition or relief-duty was payable by the pursuers or either of them to the Earl of Fife in respect to the lands during the life of the Marquis of Huntly; and (3) that the said trustees were not liable in any composition in respect of the said trust-disposition in their favour and infestment thereon.

The pursuer pleaded;—(1) The pursuer the said Marquis being the heir of the vassal last entered who paid a casualty, and being himself duly entered by operation of the Conveyancing Act, 1874, is only liable in a relief-duty. (2) The pursuers as trustees not being proprietors of the said lands, are not liable in a composition.

The defender pleaded;—(1) By virtue of the Conveyancing Act, 1874, the trustees under the trust-disposition of 1882, and not the Marquis of Huntly, are now duly entered with the defender as superior.† (2) The

* Decided Dec. 5, 1885.

† Conveyancing Act, 1874, sec. 4, subsec. 2,—“Every proprietor who is at the commencement of this Act, or thereafter shall be, duly infest in the lands, shall be deemed and held to be, as at the date of the registration of such infestment in the appropriate Register of Sasines, duly entered with the nearest superior.” . . . Subsec. 3—“Such implied entry shall not prejudice or affect the right or title of any superior to any casualties, feu-duties, or arrears of feu-duties which may be due or exigible in respect of the land at or prior to the date of such entry . . . but provided always that such implied entry shall

No. 190.

July 20, 1887.
Marquis of Huntly v.
Earl of Fife.

disponees under the trust-disposition of 1882 are liable to a composition of a year's rent, although the same may not be exigible during the lifetime of the Marquis of Huntly.

The Lord Ordinary (Kinnear) repelled the defences, and pronounced decree of declarator in terms of the conclusions of the summons.*

not entitle any superior to demand any casualty sooner than he could by the law prior to this Act, or by the conditions of the feu-right, have required the vassal to enter or to pay such casualty irrespective of his entering."

* "OPINION.—The Marquis of Huntly's title to the lands in question was completed in 1866 by recording a decree of special service in his favour as heir of tailzie and provision to his father, the late Marquis, in the General Register of Sasines. He was therefore in the position of being infeft base under the deceased Earl of Fife by virtue of Service of Heirs Act when the Conveyancing Act of 1874 came into operation and effected his entry with the defender as the nearest superior. He thus became liable in payment of a relief-duty, which amounted to one penny Scots, the lands being held for payment of one penny in name of blench-farm if asked allenarly. But payment was not asked nor offered, and no consideration has yet been given for a renewal of the investiture.

"A variety of deeds for disentailing and re-entailing the lands were executed between 1876 and 1884, none of which in any way affected the investiture. But in 1882 the Marquis conveyed the lands to the other pursuers in trust for the payment of certain specified debts, with a power to sell to the extent to which the Marquis himself had power to sell and realise under his titles, but under an obligation to reconvey when the trust purposes have been satisfied. The trustees were infeft by recording the disposition in their favour, and thereupon were entered with the defender as superior by the operation of the Act of 1874.

"The question in these circumstances is, whether the casualty now payable to the defender is the relief-duty of one penny Scots for the entry of the heir, or a year's rent of the lands as composition for the entry of a singular successor!

"The question depends upon whether the Marquis is still proprietor infeft in the subjects in question, or whether he has been divested in favour of his trust-disponees. If he is undivested he is clearly entitled to the declarator he seeks, because in that view he is the vassal infeft in the lands and duly entered with the superior.

"On the other hand, if there is no subsisting fee in him he can have no title to interpose between the superior and his disponees, who on that supposition will have been entered as vassals in his room.

"If the disposition therefore had been ex facie absolute, I think it clear that the superior would have been entitled to exact payment of composition as for the entry of a singular successor. The investiture of a disponee upon an absolute title would have left no room for the supposition of a continuing fee in the disponent, and the previous entry of the divested disponent would afford no answer to the superior's demand, because as no consideration was paid for his entry, he (the superior) would not have been demanding a casualty sooner than he might have done under the prior law. There can be no question that a casualty is presently exigible, because no casualty has been paid on entry by any living vassal. It is settled by the case of Mounsey v. Palmer, 12 R. 236, that the superior's demand is available against the actual vassals alone, and whether they are to pay composition or relief must depend upon the character in which they have entered.

"But it has been settled law since the case of Campbell v. Ederlin's Creditors, that an infeftment under a conveyance which bears on its face to be a conveyance in trust for the payment of creditors, even although it gives a power of sale to the trustees, does not divest the grantor of his feudal title to the subject conveyed, but merely operates as an incumbrance upon his right. The feudal fee in the Marquis of Huntly therefore has not been transferred to his trust-disponees, but remains in him precisely as it was before the trust-disposition was executed, but subject to a burden, which may be extinguished by a discharge, or by payment of the debts in security of which it was created. If the trustees were to sell in the execution of these powers, the Marquis would be divested by the infestment of the purchaser, but until a sale is effected he is still the proprietor infest. This is fixed beyond all question as a principle of feudal conveyancing.

No. 190.

July 20, 1887.

Marquis of Huntly v.
Earl of Fife.

"It follows that the Marquis of Huntly is still the vassal infest in the lands, and as such he is entitled to protect his estate by tendering payment of the relief-duty, which is undoubtedly exigible and which has not been paid. It is said to have been decided by the cases of Lamont v. Rankine and Ferrier v. Baillie that there is no room for the entry of an heir to the granter of a trust-disposition after the trustees have been entered by the implication of the statute, and that by the same reasoning the granter himself cannot continue to hold the position of an entered vassal after his disponees have been infest. But all that was decided in these cases was that it is no more possible under the existing law than under the law as it stood before the Conveyancing Act for two co-ordinate infestments to co-exist in the same fee. And the principle upon which the decision in the case of Ederline and the numerous cases which followed it proceeded is, that the infestment of a trustee for the payment of debts is not co-ordinate with the infestment of the granter, but may co-exist with it as a mere encumbrance. There is nothing inconsistent, therefore, with Lamont v. Rankine and Ferrier v. Baillie in holding that the Marquis of Huntly is still undivested of the feudal fee which was vested in him by his recorded service and by the operation of the Conveyancing Act. Nor would these decisions create any obstacle to the service of his heir-at-law if the fee became vacant by his death while the lands remain unsold in the hands of the trustees. The implied entry of the trustees under a mere security title will no more divest the truster of the estate held of his superior than their infestment upon his own precept will divest him of the dominium utile.

"The defender, however, maintains that the implied entry of the trustees by the operation of the Conveyancing Act entitles him to payment of a composition, because trustees for creditors, under the old law, could not have obtained an entry upon other terms. The cases must have been exceedingly rare in which such trustees thought it necessary to enter where the lands were held of a subject, since it was not desirable to begin the administration for creditors by the sacrifice of a year's rent. It is true, however, that if they did desire to enter they could not compel the superior to receive them except on payment of composition; but it does not follow that under the present law the superior can demand payment for an implied entry. He must shew that he could have required the trustees to enter under the prior law, and he could not have done so if the fee was already full.

"It is said that the conveyance may turn out to be an absolute alienation because the trustees may sell, and that the pursuers are not entitled to the decree they ask so long as the effect of the conveyance is in suspense. But if the effect of the conveyance is in suspense, it has not divested the granter. If the trustees should sell and convey the estate or a part of it to a purchaser, their disponee will be entered as a regular successor, and he will have to pay composition in that character if the fee would at that time have been vacant but for his entry. But in the meantime it is filled by Lord Huntly, and he and his trustees had a legitimate interest to secure his position by payment of the relief-duty in order to protect their disponees against any demand for composition being brought against them sooner than they could have been required to enter under the old law."

APPENDIX.

The following Report, appended to the Defender's Minute of Debate in the case of the Glasgow Provident Investment Society v. Westminster Fire Office, supra, p. 947, is referred to in Lord Trayner's opinion in that case :—

EXTRACT from The Review of 13th January 1886.

HIGH COURT OF JUSTICE—QUEEN'S BENCH DIVISION, December 18, 1885.

(Before Mr Justice CAVE and Mr Justice WILLS.)

Nichols & Co. v. Scottish Union and National Insurance Company.

Dec. 18, 1885.
Nichols & Co.
v. Scottish
Union and
National Insurance Co.

HIGH COURT OF JUSTICE (ENGLAND).
Justice Cave.
Justice Wills.

THIS case, which came before the Court on a special case stated by an arbitrator for the opinion of the Court, was an action brought by the plaintiffs, who are paper manufacturers at Grimshaw bridge, near Darwen, to recover from the defendants, a fire insurance company incorporated by special Act, with head offices at Edinburgh and London, the sum of £416, claimed under an agreement of fire insurance. Before the proposal to insure them, certain mills, or property connected therewith, known as Grimshaw Bridge Paper Mills, in the township of Yates and Peckup-Bank, in the county of Lancaster, and a steam-engine, boiler, and other machinery and chattels connected therewith, and certain other property in Eccleshill, in the said county, had been mortgaged to the Blackburn and District Permanent Benefit Building Society, and this society, under the powers of their mortgage, had agreed by memorandum in writing, dated January 28, 1878, to sell the said mills and property to the plaintiffs for £5250; £250 of this sum was to be paid in cash, and the remainder of the purchase-money, £5000, was to be secured by mortgage of the premises in the form ordinarily used by the society. The plaintiffs by the agreement agreed to take, and took, 500 shares in the said society, pursuant to the rules thereof, being let into possession of the premises from the date of the agreement. They were then called upon under the rules of the society to insure the property in the names of the trustees. On July 11, 1878, Mr S. A. Nichols, being an agent of the Lancashire Insurance Company, effected an insurance with it for £4000. The buildings in the policy were numbered 1, 2, 3, 4, and 5. Building 1 was insured for £300, buildings 2 and 3 for £650, and buildings 4 and 5 for £200. On 3d December 1878 the plaintiffs, for their own benefit, proposed to the defendants to effect an insurance against fire with them on the said mills and property to the extent of £2500; this sum was distributed over the various portions of the said mills and property, £1500 of it being attributed to the buildings 1, 2, 3, 4, and 5. Thus, at the time of the loss or damage by fire which took place on the premises on 22d December 1878, there was an insurance in the names of the trustees subsisting effected with the Lancashire Company, and another subsisting effected in the name of the plaintiffs with the defendant company for £1500 covering the same buildings. The damage by the fire to the buildings was fixed and ascertained at £1554. Before action the defendants had paid to the plaintiffs £1083, and the Lancashire Company had effected repairs to No. 1 building to the extent of £24, and had paid to the trustees £30, which sum was subsequently paid or allowed by the trustees to the plaintiffs, leaving £416, the amount of the claim in this action, still unpaid in respect of the loss. It was admitted that, assuming the defendants were liable to a rateable proportion only, this amounted to £1083, which they had already paid. The question for the Court was, whether, under the circumstances, the plaintiffs were entitled to recover from the defendants the £416. Rule 43 of the society was in these terms:—"All property mortgaged to this society shall be insured, and the secretaries shall effect the insurance immediately upon any advance being made in the names of the trustees of the society, and shall continue the insurance for such an amount as the board may consider necessary. The member on whose account such premiums for insurance shall be paid shall, on demand, refund the amount so paid, or the secretaries shall be authorised to deduct it from the first money tendered to them by such member." Rule 45,—“When any property mortgaged shall have sustained damage by fire, the secretaries, on behalf of the trustees, shall receive the amount of the damage so sustained from the insurance office, and shall give a receipt for the same, which shall be a sufficient discharge to the office liable by virtue of any policy of insurance. The money received for such damage shall be applied to the payment of the amount secured in the mortgage deed of the premises, or, at the option of the board, shall be expended in repairing the damages.” The ninth and tenth conditions of the policy issued by the Lancashire Insurance Company were in these words:—

“9. If at the time of any loss or damage by fire happening to any property hereby insured there be any other subsisting insurance or insurances, whether effected by the insured or by any other person, covering the same property, this company shall not be liable to pay or contribute more than its rateable proportion of such loss or damage.

“10. In all cases where any other subsisting insurance or insurances, whether effected by the insured either exclusively or together with any other property in and subject to the same risk only shall be subject to average, the insurance on such property under this policy shall be subject to average in like manner.”

Mr Henn Collins, Q.C. (with whom was Mr Bigham, Q.C.), for the plaintiffs, cited Lees v. Whiteley (L. R., 2 Eq. 143) and The North British and Mercantile Insurance Company v. The London, Liverpool, and Globe Insurance Company (5 Ch. Div. 569).

Mr Cohen, Q.C. (with whom was Mr J. Gorell Barnes), for the defendants, cited Darrell v. Tibbets (5 Q. B. Div. 560), and Castellain v. Preston (11 Q. B. Div. 380). With reference to the case of The North British and Mercantile Insurance Company v. The London and Liverpool and Globe Insurance Company (sup.), the learned counsel said that the decision in it had astonished insurance companies, and induced them to insert the word “buildings” instead of that of “property” in their policies.

Mr Justice CAVE said the question for the Court was whether the insurance with the Lancashire Insurance Company covered that effected by the plaintiffs with the defendant company. If the interest is the same, the plaintiffs were only entitled to the moneys already paid to them. Rule 43 of the society would appear to leave the matter open. It is necessarily of the greatest importance to the mortgagee that the property should be insured. Whether the name of the mortgagor and mortgagee be given in a policy is immaterial to the mortgagee, but this is otherwise with the mortgagor. The present issue was really decided by rule 45, the terms of which were fatal to the contention of the plaintiff.

Mr Justice WILLS concurred.

JUDGMENT.

Mr JUSTICE CAVE.—The question in this case is whether, as is stated in the seventh paragraph of the case, the insurance with the Lancashire Company does

Dec. 18, 1885.
Nichols & Co.
v. Scottish
Union and
National Insurance Co.

Dec. 18, 1885.
Nichols & Co.
v. Scottish
Union and
National Insurance Co.

cover the same interest as that effected with the Scottish Union and National Insurance Company. If the interests are the same in the two policies, why, then, the clause set out in paragraph 7 applies, and the plaintiff is only entitled to recover a proportion of the loss or damage from the defendants. If, on the other hand, the interests are different, why, then, there is nothing in common between the two, and that paragraph does not apply. In other words, if it is the interest of the mortgagor which is insured in the policy with the Lancashire Company, then, as it is undoubtedly the interest of the mortgagor which is insured in the policy with the Scottish Union Company, the interests insured are the same; but, if in the policy with the Lancashire Company it is the interest of the mortgagee only that is insured, why, then, the interests are not the same. In order to see which of those is the right construction, one must look through, firstly, the agreement between the parties. Now, the agreement between the parties was contained, amongst other things, in the rules of the society, and the material parts of those rules are to be found in rules 43 and 45. Rule 43 says,—“All property mortgaged to this society shall be insured, and the secretaries shall effect the insurance, immediately upon any advance being made, in the names of the trustees of the society, and shall continue the insurance for such an amount as the board may consider necessary. The member on whose account such premiums for insurance shall be paid shall, on demand, refund the amount so paid, or the secretaries shall be authorised to deduct it from the first money tendered to them by such member.” Now, it appears to me that clause so far leaves the matter still open. All that it provides for is, that there shall be an insurance. Now, it is to the interest, of course, of the mortgagee that there shall be an insurance, because he relies for the recovery of his money, first, on the personal liability of the mortgagor, and secondly, upon the property which he takes in mortgage. If by any accident the property taken in mortgage is destroyed by fire, it is obvious that, unless in some way he is protected by insurance, he is thrown back on the personal liability of the mortgagor, and, therefore, where the property mortgaged is capable of being destroyed by fire, it is important for the security of the mortgagee that he should in some way or other be insured. Now, whether the interest of the mortgagor is insured, or whether the interest of the mortgagee alone is insured, is, for the purpose of the mortgagee, immaterial, because in either case he will be safeguarded. For the purposes of the mortgagor, of course, it is far from being immaterial, because, if it is only the interest of the mortgagee that is insured, he derives no benefit from it whatever, whilst, if it is his own interest that is insured, he does derive a corresponding benefit. Now, therefore, where it is the subject of agreement between the parties, one prima facie would expect the mortgagor to stipulate that his interest should be insured, especially where he himself has to pay the premium, because, in that case, he would derive an advantage which he would entirely fail to get from the payment if it is confined solely to the interest of the mortgagee, and provided provision is made for the mortgagee getting hold of the insurance money, it is, as I have said, quite indifferent to the mortgagee whether the interest is that of the mortgagor,—that is to say, the whole interest in the property,—or the interest of the mortgagee in getting his debt paid. Now, that being so, we come to Rule 43, which provides that “when any property mortgaged shall have sustained damage by fire, the secretaries on behalf of the trustees shall receive the amount of the damage so sustained from the insurance office, and shall give a receipt for the same, which shall be a sufficient discharge to the office liable by virtue of any policy of insurance." So far, again, there is nothing to shew very conclusively which interest it is which is intended to be insured. Then we come to the latter part of the clause :—"The money received for such damage shall be applied to the payment of the amount secured in the mortgage deed of the premises, or, at the option of the board, shall be expended in repairing the damages." Now, it seems to me that that clause is decisive of the question at issue. If the money is to be applied in payment of the amount secured in the mortgage deed, either it is to be applied for the benefit of the mortgagor, because his debt is to that extent wiped out, or, if it is not applied for the benefit of the mortgagor, what follows?—that that clause is merely ridiculous. It says :—"The money received for such damage shall be applied to the payment of the amount secured in the mortgage," leaving the mortgagees, nevertheless, at liberty the very next moment to bring an action for that very same money, only for the benefit of the insurance company, instead of for their own benefit. Now, it is absolutely impossible to conceive that any stipulation of that kind should have been made between the parties. There is no earthly object in it, unless that means that the money is to be applied in payment of the amount secured by the mortgage deed, and to that extent is to discharge the mortgagor from his liability. I cannot conceive what earthly possible use there could have been, as between mortgagor and mortgagee, in inserting that clause in an agreement which was intended to affect their rights as between themselves. It seems to me that the only possible construction which one can, in common sense, put on that is, that the moneys, when received from the insurance company, are to be applied to the benefit of the mortgagor, as well as the benefit, incidentally, of course, of the mortgagee, and that, consequently, the interest which is insured is really the interest of the mortgagor, including, as of course in such a case it does, also the interest of the mortgagee, that is to say, the mortgagee derives incidentally a benefit from it. But the person who is intended to be benefited in the first place, and through him incidentally the mortgagee (because you cannot benefit the mortgagor without benefitting the mortgagee), is the mortgagor; and when you consider that the premiums are to be paid by the mortgagor, and that this is a subject-matter in which payments of principal are continually being made from time to time, so that the interest—that is to say, of the mortgagee—is continually diminishing, becoming less and less as time goes on, why, every consideration points to the desirability of insuring, not an interest which is continually growing less and less, and which will not do the mortgagor one pennyworth of good, but of insuring an interest which will remain the same throughout, and which will benefit the mortgagor equally with the mortgagee. Then, that being the state of things, the mortgagees have undertaken that the property shall be insured, the mortgagor of course paying the premiums, and they have undertaken that they will receive the money and will apply it to the benefit of the mortgagor. Now, then, how are they to do that? The only way in which they can do that is not by insuring their own interest only, because that would not effect the purpose at all. They can only do it by insuring the interest of the mortgagor, and, when you come to the document itself, the document itself does not contain a single word which in any way limits the interest to be insured to the bare interest of the mortgagee—that is to say, to secure that he shall be paid, leaving the insurers to be subrogated in his place, and to sue the mortgagor. On the contrary, it is a

Dec. 18, 1885.
Nichols & Co.
v. Scottish
Union and
National Insurance Co.

Dec. 18, 1885.
Nichols & Co.
v. Scottish
Union and
National Insurance Co.

form of policy of insurance which is applicable where the whole interest is intended to be insured, and nothing is said in it at all as to how much of the interest in those buildings is to be insured. But the buildings themselves are spoken of as being the property which is to be insured, and, as I have said all through, the language of the policy is just that which it would be if the whole were endeavoured to be secured. Now, suppose an action were brought in the name of the trustees of the building society upon this policy of insurance, it is wide enough to cover the total interest in the property as far as the language goes. Now, what answer could they set up? They would set up,—“Well, but you have got no interest. You, Henry Ward and George Pickup Hartley, you represent the Building Society. You have described yourselves as trustees of the Building Society, and you have no interest in having these moneys under the circumstances of the case; or, at all events, if you have an interest in getting them out of us, it is only for your own protection, and we must be put in your position so that we can sue Nichols.” The answer to that, I think, would be,—“Oh, dear no; that is not so at all. We have entered into an agreement with Nichols, by virtue of which we have engaged to apply these policy moneys in such a way that they wipe out his debt, and if you contend that they are only to be paid to us upon the terms that we shall immediately put in our claim and sue him for this debt, then they do not wipe out the debt at all, and then we have broken our agreement with him, and then we shall be liable to be sued by him; and we shall be liable to be sued by him for the very sum which he would have to pay you, and consequently we shall get nothing at all out of our insurance.” The real way out of that difficulty is to hold what seems to me to be the intention of the parties, that the total interest in the property was intended to be insured for the benefit of the mortgagor, and so incidentally for the benefit of the mortgagee, consequently, that the contention of the defendants is right, and that our answer to this case must be in their favour.

MR JUSTICE WILLS.—I am of the same opinion. Under a clause like the one with which we have to deal, a clause as to payment in rateable proportion only by the insurance company, who are defendants in this case, the question always is, whether the subject-matter of that insurance and of the insurance with another company, which is said to give rise to the right of the first insurance company to pay a rateable proportion only, is identical. If it is, the clause applies. If the subject-matter of the insurance in the two policies is different, then it does not apply. Now, in a case like the present, in which the question arises with respect to the mortgagor and mortgagee, the question, therefore, must be always whether the policy effected in the name of the mortgagee is really an insurance of his interest, or whether it is an insurance of a part of the interest covered by the policy effected by the mortgagor for the whole value of his goods. Now, if it is intended to be for the benefit of the mortgagee only, this consequence would follow, that the payment of the money secured by it by the insurance company with which the mortgagee insures in no way alters the relations between the mortgagor and the mortgagee, and when it is paid, and although it is paid, the mortgagor is still liable upon his covenant in the mortgage deed to pay the whole amount of the mortgage money which may still be owing to the mortgagee, and really the consequence of that is, that we must always look at the substance rather than the form in these matters. The consequence of that is, that really the second policy, although in form an insurance of the property described in the same words as in the original policy, is really an insurance of the solvency of the mortgagor and of nothing else, because the relations between the mortgagor and mortgagee being unaffected by the payment of the subject of insurance to the mortgagee, it follows that the insurance company which has effected that insurance would have a right to sue the mortgagor in the name of the mortgagee and to recover to the extent to which they had paid any debt that might be due upon a mortgage contract between the mortgagor and the mortgagee. So that, when you come to deprive the matter of all the mere circumstances and mere forms, and come to the substance of it, it is an insurance of the solvency of the mortgagor, and it does not go beyond that. That being so, it certainly is not an insurance of the same subject-matter as that which has been effected by the mortgagor who has made his insurance in the ordinary manner on the physical property which he describes in his policy. Now, anything, therefore, which goes to shew that that is not what the parties intended, goes of necessity to prove that the real substance of the insurance effected by the mortgagee is not one merely for his own benefit, but is one on behalf of the mortgagor, although nominally on behalf of the mortgagee. Now, when we come to look at clause 45, and to take clauses 43 and 45 together, it is hardly possible to doubt that there are elements in this case which go to shew that the benefit of the insurance must enure to the mortgagor and not to the mortgagee, because, when the insurance company pay the money, it is as between the mortgagor and the mortgagee to be deemed an extinction pro tanto of the debt, or else is to be applied (which comes to the same thing as far as his pecuniary interest is concerned) in repairing or rebuilding the premises, that is to say, in reinstatement. That shews to my mind conclusively that it is in substance, although not in form, an insurance for the benefit of the mortgagor. If so, it is an insurance in substance (although not in form) pro tanto, and, to the extent to which it goes, an insurance which covers exactly the same subject-matter as the original insurance on the part of, and in the name of the mortgagor; and the moment it is established that there is an identity of subject-matter, then it seems to me to be past all possibility of argument that the rateable clause does apply. I am of opinion, therefore, in this case that it does apply, and that our judgment must be for the defendant.

MR COHEN.—That will be judgment for the defendants with costs, my Lord?
MR JUSTICE CAVE.—Yes.

Dec. 18, 1885.
Nichols & Co.
v. Scottish
Union and
National Insurance Co.

INDEX OF MATTERS

IN VOLUME XIV.

Cases decided in the House of Lords are printed in Italics.
Cases decided in the Court of Justiciary will be found under the head JUSTICIARY CASES.

ACQUIESCENCE. See Church, 2—Contract, 8.

ADMINISTRATION OF JUSTICE. Removal of law-agent's name from roll—Law-Agents (Scotland) Act, 1873 (36 and 37 Vict. cap. 63), secs. 13 and 14.

1. In a petition by the Incorporated Society of Law-Agents praying the Court to direct the removal, from the rolls of law-agents in the Court of Session and in the Sheriff Court of the Lothians and Peebles, of the name of a law-agent who had been convicted of an offence under the 11th section of the Criminal Law Amendment Act, 1885, and had been expelled from the Society of Solicitors before the Supreme Courts, the Court in the circumstances, and having regard to a representation signed by a large number of enrolled law-agents to the effect that he should not be removed, refused the petition. Incorporated Society of Law-Agents in Scotland v. Clark, Dec. 3, 1886, p. 161.

Wrongous official act—Malice.

2. Action of damages against public official. M'Murphy v. Campbell, May 21, 1887, p. 725; Beaton v. Ivory, July 19, 1887, p. 1057.

Apprehension by magistrate without written warrant.

3. Observations upon the powers of Magistrates to make apprehensions without written warrant. Beaton v. Ivory, July 19, 1887, p. 1057.

Summary prosecution.

4. Alleged competition of civil right. Scott v. Thomson, June 4, 1887, Just. Cases, p. 45.

AGENT AND CLIENT. Liability of agent to client for investments.

1. In an action brought by a client against a firm of law-agents for recovery of money invested through them on a bad security, it was proved that the agents acted for both parties, the borrowers being the brothers of the leading partner of the agents' firm. The client, a widow lady of middle age, handed the money, a sum of £400, to this partner, and he lent it at five per cent on the security of house property bought by the borrowers immediately before for £1350, and already burdened with a bond for £1000 and a feu-duty of £15. The pursuer averred and deponed at the proof that she had told her agent to lend her money on a first bond, and had given no further instructions; the agent, on the other hand, averred and deponed that he had arranged with a relative and adviser of the pursuer, since dead, before he met her, that this particular security should be taken, and that it was taken with her full approval and in knowledge of its being a postponed security. There was no other material evidence. Held on the proof that the defender had been employed as agent for the pursuer, and that that agency was not limited, as the defender averred, and that, therefore, the security being such as no prudent agent should have taken for a client, the defender was liable for the loss. Oastler v. Dill, Smillie, & Wilson, &c., Oct. 29, 1886, p. 12.
2. Circumstances in which the Court held that a firm of law-agents were not bound to make good to a client a sum invested by their advice on a heritable security which turned out to be insufficient.

AGENT AND CLIENT—Continued.

Opinions that law-agents in lending a client's money on heritable security are bound to take all reasonable care in seeing to the sufficiency of the security, and are not responsible merely for the validity of the bond. Stirling v. Mackenzie, Gardner, & Alexander, Dec. 7, 1886, p. 170.

Agent's responsibilities to third parties.

3. Observations, per curiam, upon the responsibilities of agents in protecting rights conferred by their clients upon third parties. Williamson v. Bagg, May 18, 1887, p. 720.

AGENT AND PRINCIPAL. Stockbroker—Contract for differences.

A stockbroker, in carrying over at the settlement £10,000 "Trunk Thirds" stock bought for a client, sent his client a continuation-note in these terms:—"I have continued for you as under. Sold 10,000 Trunk 3rds at £50, bought at £50, 3s. 3d. com. in a/c." In reality the broker had not bought that amount of stock at the price stated, but had bought a much larger quantity in different parcels and at different prices. These he lumped together and divided among those of his clients who had given him orders for Trunk Thirds, charging as the price the average of the different prices. This average price was that stated in the above continuation-note, and it corresponded to none of the individual prices. In an action by the stockbroker against the client for payment of the differences on a series of such transactions, held by a majority of seven Judges (viz., Lord Justice-Clerk, Lords Craighill, Shand, and Adam, diss. Lords Mura, Young, and Rutherford Clark), that in so purchasing the stock the pursuer was to be regarded as having bought it on his own account, and not as agent for the defender, and that the defender having employed the pursuer merely as a broker was not responsible, no special custom of trade in regard to brokers on the Stock Exchange having been averred or proved. Maffet v. Stewart, March 4, 1887, p. 506.

ALIMENT. Amount—Reasonable provision.

1. The beneficiary under a testamentary trust enjoyed the income of £26,000, which amounted to about £875 per annum, as an alimentary provision from which the diligence of creditors was excluded. He was twenty-six years of age, unmarried, and was subject to no incapacity, mental or physical. He was the second son of a landed proprietor, and, in the event of his surviving his mother, would succeed to an estate. He had no other source of income than the alimentary provision above mentioned. Held that, in the circumstances, £500 per annum would be a suitable provision for the beneficiary, and that the balance of the income was open to the diligence of his creditors. Livingstone v. Livingstone, Nov. 5, 1886, p. 43.

Of mother-in-law—Amount.

2. Held (following Moir v. Reid, 4 Macph. 1060), that a husband is bound to contribute to the aliment of his wife's mother when her circumstances are such as to entitle her to aliment from her children.

Circumstances in which a widow, unable to support herself, was held entitled to aliment from her children at the rate of £40 per annum. Foulis v. Fairbairn, July 20, 1887, p. 1088.

See Parent and Child, 2, 3.

ALIMENTARY PROVISION. Excess over suitable aliment—Diligence.

A testator directed his trustees to pay certain proportions of the residue of his estate to his grandchildren on their attaining twenty-five years of age, but, in the event of any beneficiary so conducting himself as not to merit the approbation of the trustees, they were empowered to restrict the provision in his favour to a liferent alienary, and it was provided "that it shall not be in the power of the party or parties whose shares have been so restricted to a liferent to sell, assign, dispoise, or convey away his or their said liferent, but the same shall be applied for his or their alimentary use alienably, nor shall it be in the power of his or their creditors to attach the said liferent by arrestment, poinding, or other legal diligence, all of which are hereby excluded." Held that the alimentary provision was only protected from the diligence of creditors to the extent of a reasonable provision, regard being had to the station and circumstances of the beneficiary, and that quoad excessum it was open to diligence. Livingstone v. Livingstone, Nov. 5, 1886, p. 43.

ALIMENTARY PROVISION—Continued.

APPEAL. House of Lords—Leave to appeal.

Leave to appeal to the House of Lords against an interlocutor appointing a case to be tried before a Lord Ordinary without a jury refused. Scottish Rights of Way and Recreation Society, Limited, v. Macpherson, Nov. 16, 1886, p. 74.

See Bankruptcy, 5, 6, 7, 8—Justiciary Cases, 14, 15, 16—Process, 19, 20, 21.

ARBITRATION. Oversman, appointment of—Casting lots.

1. Two arbiters, who had power to appoint an oversman, differed as to which of two persons should be nominated. Both were agreed that the two were equally eligible, and eventually they selected one by lot. Held that the appointment was valid. Smith v. Liverpool and London and Globe Insurance Co., July 15, 1887, p. 931.

Oversman—Disqualification.

2. Held that two arbiters, who had power to appoint an oversman, were not entitled to appoint a person who was a shareholder in an unincorporated company—one of the parties to the reference. Smith v. Liverpool and London and Globe Insurance Co., July 15, 1887, p. 931.

ARRESTMENT. Ship.

1. Observations (per Lord Fraser) on warrants for arresting and dismantling ships. English's Coasting and Shipping Co., Limited, v. British Finance Co., Limited, Dec. 10, 1886, p. 220.

See Expenses, 8.

Prescription—Furthcoming—Act 1669, cap. 9—Personal Diligence Act, 1838 (1 and 2 Vict. c. 114), sec. 22.

2. A creditor arrested upon a decree a fund vested in his debtor, but not payable till the death of an annuitant. Within three years of the date of the arrestments the debtor applied for and obtained decree of cessio. The arrester appeared to oppose the application, but did not found on his arrestments. Held that on the lapse of the three years, the arrestments prescribed, as they had not been "pursued or insisted on" in the sense of the Act 1669, cap. 9.

Observed, that though the arrested fund was not payable till the death of the annuitant, it would have been competent for the arrester to interrupt the course of prescription by raising an action of furthcoming, concluding for payment upon that event. Jameson v. Sharp, March 18, 1887, p. 643.

ASSIGNATION. See Trust, 3.BANKRUPTCY. Effect of Bankruptcy—Illegal preference—Act 1696, c. 5.

1. Where money is advanced on the faith of a specific security to be immediately granted, it will not vitiate the security that it is not formally completed till within sixty days of the granter's bankruptcy; but when the stipulation is that the debtor shall give security, whether general or over a specific subject, whenever the creditor shall desire it, the granting of the security within sixty days of the granter's bankruptcy is reducible under the Act 1696, c. 5. Gourlay v. Mackie, Jan. 27, 1887, p. 403.

Trust for creditors—Stipulation for discharge—Right of non-acceding creditor to sue trustee for share.

2. Where a debtor executed a trust-deed for behoof of acceding creditors, with the condition that all creditors acceding or receiving a dividend should be held to have discharged their claims in full, held (1) that a creditor who did not accede to the trust was entitled to a share of the estate in proportion to his debt unconditionally, and (2) that he was entitled to recover his share by direct action against the trustee. Ogilvie & Son v. Taylor, Jan. 27, 1887, p. 399.

BANKRUPTCY—Continued.

Sequestration—Process—Application to sequestrations of Sheriff Court Act, 1876 (39 and 40 Vict. cap. 70), sec. 6.

3. Question, whether petitions in the Sheriff Court for sequestration under the Bankruptcy Act, 1856, must be in the form prescribed by the 6th section of the Sheriff Court Act, 1876. Opinion (per Lord Young) that they need not. Cuthbertson v. Gibson, May 31, 1887, p. 736.

Sequestration—Process—Reclaiming Note—Application to sequestrations of Court of Session Act, 1868 (31 and 32 Vict. cap. 100).

4. Held that the Court of Session Act, 1868, did not apply to proceedings under the Bankruptcy Acts, and that a reclaiming note against an interlocutor of the Lord Ordinary on the Bills in an appeal against a resolution of creditors in a sequestration under the 169th section of the Bankruptcy Act, 1856, was competently brought within fourteen days, and without leave of the Lord Ordinary. M'George v. M'George's Creditors, June 25, 1887, p. 841.

Sequestration—Process—Election of Trustee—Review of interlocutory judgment before appointment.

5. A note of objections was lodged with a Sheriff against his confirming the election of a trustee on a sequestrated estate, in which the objector alleged that the person elected was unsuitable on various grounds, and that the cautioner proposed was insufficient. The Sheriff allowed a proof, and the trustee appealed to the Court of Session. The Court sustained the competency of the appeal, but, without deciding as to the relevancy of the averments, refused to interfere with the Sheriff's exercise of his discretion in ordering inquiry. Moncur v. Macdonald, &c., Jan. 8, 1887, p. 305.
6. In a sequestration a Sheriff pronounced an interlocutor disposing of certain objections to votes in the election of a trustee, and allowing a proof with reference to another objection. The candidate to whom the Sheriff's judgment was adverse appealed. Held that the Sheriff's judgment, in so far as it disposed of the objections, was final, and in so far as it allowed a proof, was incompetent. Reid v. Strathie, June 29, 1887, p. 847.

Sequestration—Process—Appeal—Resolution accepting composition offer—Bankruptcy Act, 1856 (19 and 20 Vict. cap. 79), secs. 138, 139, 169.

7. Held that an appeal by certain creditors on a sequestrated estate against the resolution of an alleged statutory majority of their number accepting a composition offer by the bankrupt was competent under the 169th section of the Bankruptcy Act, 1856, and was not excluded by the fact that the appellants had another remedy under the 138th and 139th sections of the Act. M'George v. M'George's Creditors, June 25, 1887, p. 841.

Sequestration—Process—Appeal against trustee's deliverance sustaining preferential claim—Duty of trustee.

8. Where an appeal is taken against the deliverance of a trustee in a sequestration, it ought to be served upon the creditor whose interest it is to oppose it, and it is not the trustee's duty to defend his deliverance by appealing against the interlocutor of a Sheriff recalling it, when the result of that appeal, if successful, would be injurious to the interests of the general body of creditors. Skinner's Trustee v. Keith, March 4, 1887, p. 563.

Sequestration—Balancing of accounts—Improvements on a pupil's estate by his father without authority—Sequestration of father.

9. A pupil having succeeded to heritage, his father, as his administrator-in-law, proceeded to execute improvements on it, and borrowed money for the purpose, granting, as "tutor-at-law," a bond and disposition in security primarily over the pupil's lands, and secondarily and collaterally over lands belonging to himself, declaring that in the event of his making payment he should be entitled to relief from the pupil's lands and the proprior thereof. The bond narrated the purpose to which the loan was to be applied. The father having become bankrupt some years afterwards, the trustee upon his sequestrated estate paid up the loan, taking an assignation to the security, including the right of relief, and then sued the son for £500, the amount to which it was admitted he was lucratus by his father's expenditure. The son pleaded that he was entitled to set off the rents of his estate (amounting to £310), which were in his father's hands at the date of the sequestration unaccounted for, against the £500. Held that the bond was invalid quoad the pupil, and that the only obligation upon him was to recompense his father for the sum beneficially expended by him upon the estate, and that this was a debt due to the father at the date of his sequestration against which the pupil was entitled to set the rents then due to him by his father (diss. Lord Shand, who held that the history of the transaction shewed that the true creditor in the improvement expenditure was the grantor of the loan, and that the pursuer having obtained an assignation thereto after the sequestration was entitled to full payment of the £500, leaving the son to rank as a creditor on his father's estate for the rents). Scott's Trustee v. Scott, July 19, 1887, p. 1043.

BANKRUPTCY—Continued.

See Judicial Factor, 1, 6.

BILL OF EXCHANGE. Promissory-note—Sexennial limitation—Terminus a quo—12 Geo. III. c. 72, sec. 37.

1. In the case of a promissory-note payable three months after notice, the sexennial limitation does not begin to run till the lapse of three months after a demand for payment has been made. Broddelius v. Grischotti, March 4, 1887, p. 536.

Promissory-note—Stamp—Stamp Act, 1870 (33 and 34 Vict. c. 96), secs. 17, 54.

2. In an action to recover the amount contained in a foreign promissory-note, which, at the date of the action, was properly stamped, held that an averment that, when originally presented for payment in the United Kingdom, it was unstamped, was irrelevant, since presentation without a stamp did not involve nullity. Broddelius v. Grischotti, March 4, 1887, p. 536.

See Husband and Wife, 2.

BUILDING SOCIETY. Borrowing member—Effect of stopping business prior to liquidation—Liability for loss in questions between members.

1. The rules of a building society, constituted under the Building Societies Act, 6 and 7 Will. IV. c. 32, provided that a borrowing member who had given heritable security might have his property redeemed (1) on giving three months' notice before Whitsunday or Martinmas, by renouncing the shares representing the advance, and paying the amount of the advance under deduction of instalments already paid and interest thereon, his connection with the society, so far as these shares were concerned, then ceasing, or (2) by repaying the advance and retaining his shares, or (3) by the amount of his subscriptions with the profits allocated to him amounting to the sum advanced, his connection with the society then ceasing.

The society carried on business for some years prior to 13th May 1882, when it ceased to do so, and issued a circular to members intimating that the society had sustained loss through the depreciation of its securities, and suggesting that all members should give notice of withdrawal from the society, so as to prevent individual members obtaining preferences. On 9th July 1884 the society presented a petition for a winding-up order, which was granted on 19th July.

On 6th December 1882 Tosh, a borrowing member, paid by anticipation the final instalments on his shares, which would have fallen due and matured his shares on 3d June 1883, his subscriptions and profits allocated then amounting to the sum advanced.

On 17th April 1882 Guthrie, and on 16th May 1882 Finlay, both borrowing members, gave notice of withdrawal at Martinmas 1882.

BUILDING SOCIETY—Continued.

In an appeal held (rev. judgment of the Court of Session) that nothing had occurred prior to the winding-up order of July 1884 to suspend the operation of the rules of the society under which the shares of borrowing members matured, and under which borrowing members were entitled to withdraw.

Held further (rev. judgment of the Court of Session) that the case was ruled by Brownlie v. Russell, L. R., 8 App. Ca. 235, 10 R. (H. L.) 19, which decided that in building societies the rights of individual members in questions between them and the society fell to be determined solely by the terms of the contract embodied in the rules, and that, although the contract might give borrowing members a right to have shares of profits allocated to them, it did not thereby make them responsible for loss when that was not expressly provided for by the rules. Tosh v. North British Building Society, July 30, 1886, H. L., p. 6.

Unadvanced member—Withdrawal—Power of society to reduce sum at the credit of unadvanced members.

2. The rules of a building society provided that each member should be furnished with a pass-book in which all payments made by him should be entered; that any unadvanced or investing member might withdraw "the whole or any portion of the sum at his credit," twenty-eight days after having given notice of his intention to do so and after having left his pass-book at the office, such withdrawing member to be paid in rotation according to the priority of his notice; and that a general meeting of the members should be held annually in March or April, at which a report and statement of accounts, with a balance-sheet for the year ending 18th February preceding, should be submitted.

At the annual general meeting of the society, held on 29th March 1882, the society approved of a report by the directors recommending that in consequence of the depreciation of the heritable property on the security of which the funds of the society were invested, a sum of 1s. 6d. per £1 should be deducted from the accounts of all shareholders and placed to a suspense account.

In a question between the society and an investing member, who, after the meeting, gave notice of withdrawal, held (rev. judgment of Second Division) that the rules of the society constituted a contract between the society and each member which the society had no power to alter, and that the resolution of the society was in breach of the contract and ultra vires, and that the member who had given notice of withdrawal was entitled to receive payment of the sum standing at his credit at the date of the resolution, without deduction of any sum on account of the society's losses. Auld v. Glasgow Working-Men's Provident Investment Building Society, Feb. 15, 1887, H. L., p. 27.

Winding-up—List of Contributories.

3. In the winding-up of a building society the liquidator presented a note to the Court setting forth a scheme of settlement of the list of contributories. The following questions, arising on the construction of the rules of the society, were settled by the Court:—

Bank Interest.—Rule 13 of the society provided that "Any member holding any share, in respect of which no advance has been made, which, by the subscriptions paid and the profits thereon, shall have accumulated to £25 (the amount of said share), shall be entitled to receive the amount thereof, with bank interest from the date of completion, and his connection with the society in respect of the same shall cease." Held that there being no stipulation to the contrary, and as the funds of the society were operated on from day to day, interest was due at bank current account rates.

Advanced and unadvanced shares.—A shareholder who held forty shares of the society of the nominal value of £1000 obtained an advance of £500 from the society. Held that in the winding-up he was to be treated as having received payment by anticipation of twenty completed shares and as a holder of twenty unadvanced shares, and not as having obtained a loan on the security of his forty shares.

BUILDING SOCIETY—Continued.

Fines.—Rule 3 of the society provided that members in arrear two fortnightly instalments should pay a fine. The liquidator admitted that at the date of the last balance-sheet of the society no fines had been levied on certain members, and that it was not the practice of the society to exact fines in terms of the rule. Held that the liquidator was not entitled to enforce the rule in the winding-up.

Non-timeous withdrawal of shares.—By rule 12 it was provided that members on whose shares no advances had been made might "on one month's notice in writing to the manager withdraw his or her subscriptions paid thereon," with interest at a certain rate, "and the same shall be paid as soon after the expiry of the month's notice as the funds will permit." Held that members who only gave notice of withdrawal within one month of the date of the winding-up could not benefit by the rule.

Interest on advances.—Rule 15 provided,—"Any member who has been granted an advance shall, from the date of granting the same, become liable for such a rate of interest as along with the interest allowed by the bank will amount to 5 per cent until said member has received said advance, when he shall pay to the society interest thereon at the rate of 5 per cent on the full amount of said advance; and all interest shall be payable at the terms of Martinmas and Whitsunday; and members failing to pay the same within fourteen days thereafter shall be charged interest thereon at 5 per cent from the term of payment." Held that the rule ceased to be operative when the society ceased to be a going concern. North British Building Society v. M'Lellan, June 23, 1887, p. 827.

BURGH. Magistrates—Election—Appointment of returning officer.

1. The Provost and one of the two junior Magistrates of a police burgh fell to go out of office at the same date, both being candidates for re-election. The other junior magistrate had died. In ordinary circumstances the Provost would under the statute have been returning officer at the election, and in the event of his being one of the retiring commissioners the duty would have devolved upon one or other of the junior magistrates. The Court named one of the Sheriff-substitutes of the county, whom failing, the senior Sheriff-Clerk-Depute of the county, to act as returning officer, and superseded extract, the election falling to be held two days later. Muirhead, Oct. 29, 1886, p. 18.

Dean of Guild—Jurisdiction—Nuisance.

2. The Dean of Guild having refused to sanction the erection within burgh of a byre for the accommodation of twelve cows, on the ground that it was likely to create a nuisance, on appeal the Court, doubting the Dean of Guild's jurisdiction to entertain the question of nuisance, sisted the process to enable the objectors to bring an interdict against the erection of the building in question. This having been done, after proof the interdict was refused, and in respect thereof the Dean of Guild's interlocutor in the other process was recalled, and a remit made to him to proceed with the lining. Manson v. Forrest, June 14, 1887, p. 802.
3. The surveyor of a burgh objected to warrant being granted by the Dean of Guild Court for the increase of certain stabling accommodation belonging to a carriage-hirer, on the ground that the buildings proposed to be enlarged were in the middle of a square of buildings densely populated, and that the smell and noise from them would constitute a nuisance, and that the danger of fire in the district would be increased by them. The Dean of Guild having allowed a proof as to these objections, the petitioner appealed, and maintained that they related only to the use of the proposed building and to alleged nuisance, which were beyond the jurisdiction of the Dean of Guild. The Court (diss. Lord Rutherford Clark) refused the appeal on the ground that it was expedient that the facts should be ascertained before determining whether the questions raised by the objections fall within the jurisdiction of the Dean of Guild. Robertson v. Thomas, June 17, 1887, p. 822.

BURGH—Continued.

Dean of Guild—Free space for air—Glasgow Police Act, 1866 (29 and 30 Vict. cap. cclxxiii.), sec. 370.

4. Plans of buildings proposed to be erected in Glasgow which were held not to comply with the provisions of the 370th section of the Glasgow Police Act, 1866, requiring a certain amount of free space in front of the windows of sleeping apartments. Glass v. Glasgow Master of Works, March 5, 1887, p. 567.

Dean of Guild—Alterations "affecting the exterior dimensions" of a building—Glasgow Police Act, 1866 (29 and 30 Vict. cap. cclxxiii.), secs. 364 and 365.

5. The Glasgow Police Act, 1866, secs. 364 and 365, enacts that the proprietors of buildings within the city who, without the authority of the Dean of Guild, alter their buildings "in a manner which will affect the exterior dimensions thereof," shall be guilty of a Guild offence, and liable in a penalty. Held that the insertion of a window 5 feet by 3, which did not project beyond the plane of the wall, in each of two gables of a building was not an alteration affecting the exterior dimensions of the building in the sense of the foregoing enactment. Gourlay v. Lang, June 4, 1887, Just. Cases, p. 31.

Burgh property—Foreshore—Jus spatiiandi.

6. Held that the Act to extend the royalty of Dundee, 1831 (1 and 2 Will. IV. cap. xlv.) did not transfer the property of the foreshore ex adverso of the extended royalty of the burgh of Dundee from the Crown to the Magistrates, as representing the burgh. Keiller v. Magistrates of Dundee, Dec. 7, 1886, p. 191.
7. Held that the Magistrates of a burgh, the inhabitants of which had been in use to resort for recreation to a particular piece of foreshore, had a good title to challenge a disposition which purported to convey that foreshore in property to a private person, and that although a right of property might be shewn to exist in a private person, he had no right to exclude the public from resorting there as they had done from time immemorial. Keiller v. Magistrates of Dundee, Dec. 7, 1886, p. 191.

Police Commissioners—Sale of lands for which Commissioners had no use—Nobile officium—General Police and Improvement Act, 1862 (25 and 26 Vict. c. 101).

8. The Police Commissioners of a royal burgh resolved to sell for £200 to the town-council of the burgh a portion of the property of the Police Commissioners, acquired under sec. 125 of the General Police and Improvement Act, 1862, for which they had no use, and petitioned for leave to carry out the proposed sale, stating that though under the General Police and Improvement Act, 1862, secs. 161 and 373, they had power to discontinue the use of public washing-houses, drying-grounds, &c., and to sell the same, the Act did not contain any provisions authorising the sale of other property which was of no use to them. The Court having indicated an opinion that a sale by private bargain would be ultra vires of the Commissioners, the Commissioners obtained leave to amend the prayer of the petition, to the effect of asking for authority to put up the subjects to public auction. The Court granted the prayer of the petition, as amended. Linthgow Police Commissioners, Feb. 2, 1887, p. 444.

Erection of byre in burgh—Nuisance.

9. Held that the business of cowkeeping may be so conducted and regulated within burgh as not to be a nuisance. Manson v. Forrest, June 14, 1887, p. 802.

COMMERCIAL. Goods—Condition—Construction of contract.

Question, whether a printed circular post-card sent by shipowners to post-shippers of goods in Galway, which stated that the s.s. "Clara" would sail from Glasgow to Galway on a date named, and contained this intimation :—" All goods carried on condition as per sailing bills," which conditions relieved the shipowners from all liability for the consequences of their own or their servants' fault, could be held to apply to the return voyage of the "Clara" from Galway to Glasgow, so as to import the conditions on the sailing bills into a contract for that voyage. Lightbody's Trustee v. J. & P. Hutchison, Oct. 16, 1886, p. 4.

CARRIER—Continued.

Goods—Reparation—Consequential damages.

2. A manufacturer forwarded a bale of cloth by rail, consigned to a shipping agent at Grimsby, who was to ship it for Germany. On arrival at Grimsby the package was found to be frayed, and some slight damage done to the cloth. The shipping agent refused to take delivery, being of opinion that the goods could not be safely forwarded in their damaged package. The railway company thereupon returned them to the manufacturer, who re-packed them, and forwarded them to Germany. On arrival there they were rejected as being too late. The manufacturer having sued the railway company for damages for loss of market, held that the shipping agent was entitled to refuse to take delivery, and that the loss of market was the direct result of the damage done to the package by the railway company, who were therefore liable for it. Keddie, Gordon, & Co. v. North British Railway Co., Dec. 15, 1886, p. 233.

CHURCH. Heritors—Liability for repairs—Cess-roll of valued rent—Ecclesiastical Buildings (Scotland) Act, 1868 (31 and 32 Vict. c. 96), sec. 23.

1. In 1826 the seats in a parish church were allocated among the heritors according to their valued rents. In 1857 one of the heritors had become divested of the dominium utile of his whole lands in the parish (with the exception of the minerals), but his name remained as before on the Cess-roll of valued rent. The heritors having on various occasions after that date imposed assessments upon him for repairs of the church, in 1886 he raised an action against the heritors for declarator that he was not liable for any assessments imposed after 1857, on the ground that after that date he was no longer a heritor in the parish. Held that the heritors were bound to assess according to the Cess-roll, and had no power to alter it.

Observed that the pursuer's remedy was to apply to the Commissioners of Supply to have the roll altered, and the names of the feuars, with the proportionate part of the rent allocated upon each, entered. Trades' House of Glasgow v. Heritors of Govan, July 8, 1887, p. 910.

Heritors—Objections to validity of assessments.

2. When a heritor has objections to the legality of an assessment imposed on him by the heritors of his parish they must be stated tempestive, and not after the lapse of years. Trades' House of Glasgow v. Heritors of Govan, July 8, 1887, p. 910.

Minister—Stipend—Assistant and Successor—Annat.

3. It was provided in an agreement between a parish minister and his assistant and successor that the former should "surrender" to the latter £165 "of the annual income derivable from the benefice of said parish, payable half-yearly at Martinmas and Whitsunday." The minister having died on 29th April, held that under the agreement his executor was not bound to pay the assistant for his services between the previous Martinmas and that day, the stipend for that period being payable to the minister's next of kin as annat, and there having been no personal obligation upon him and his representatives to make any payment. Dow v. Imrie, July 15, 1887, p. 928.

Minister—Quoad sacra—Trust.

4. An estate was left to the Provost and Magistrates of Kilmarnock, "the ministers of the Established Churches of Scotland in Kilmarnock, and the minister of the parish of Riccarton, all for the time being, and their successors in office," to hold the same, and to apply the income to certain purposes, paying the balance of the income "equally between the parishes of Kilmarnock and Riccarton, to be paid to and expended by the ministers of said respective parishes in charitable and benevolent purposes connected therewith." Held (1) that the ministers of three quoad sacra parishes, the churches of which were situated within the burgh, were trustees both to hold the general fund and to receive and expend the balance of income; but (2) that the minister of a quoad sacra parish erected out of portions of Kilmarnock, of Riccarton, and of Galston parishes was neither a trustee of the general fund nor of the balance, his church being situated outside the burgh of Kilmarnock. Buchanan's Trustees v. Buchanan Bequest Trustees, Dec. 18, 1886, p. 284.

CHURCH—Continued.

Minister—Chapel of ease—Ministers' Widows' Fund.

5. Held that the minister of a chapel of ease, which had been built by private subscription, on his being inducted to the same church after its erection into a quoad sacra church, was entitled and bound to become a contributor to the Ministers' Widows' Fund. MacLagan v. Brown, July 20, 1887, p. 1083.

Glebe and churchyard—Consent of heritors to excambion of.

6. The consent of heritors is not necessary to a contract of excambion of glebe lands.

The minister of a parish, with consent of the Presbytery, excambied the site of the church, the churchyard, and part of the glebe, for other lands belonging to a heritor in the parish. In an action of reduction subsequently brought by the minister and the kirk-session for reduction of the deed as being null without consent of the heritors, held (1) that in so far as regarded the site of the church and the churchyard, the deed was invalid as granted without the consent of the heritors; (2) that quoad ultra the deed was valid—the pursuer and his successors in the benefice not being prejudiced by its partial reduction, or by the failure of the transaction with regard to the site of the church and the churchyard. Bain v. Lady Seafeld, July 15, 1887, p. 939.

Dissenting Church—Trust—Cy près.

7. Part of a congregation connected with the United Original Secession Church separated from that church with their minister, and formed a new congregation. In 1871 the congregation bought a place of worship, and a minister's house, taking the title in favour of certain members of the congregation, and such other persons as might thereafter be appointed by male members of the congregation, on condition that any trustee or member leaving the congregation and "worshipping elsewhere not in harmony with the principles contained in the Testimony (United Original Secession)," should be disqualified from acting or voting. In consequence of the minister falling into bad health the church was closed in 1878, and the trustees were authorised to sell the church. The church was not sold, but the premises were let and the rents applied in reduction of debt. In 1886 a petition was presented by the Synod of the United Original Seceders, with the concurrence and consent of four persons describing themselves as members of the congregation "at the time of its dissolution," against the two surviving trustees, praying the Court to ordain the trustees to pay over the trust-funds, and to convey the trust property to the petitioners for behoof of certain funds of the Synod, or to pay and convey the same for such purposes as the Court should deem most in accordance with the purposes of the trust, on the ground that the purposes of the trust had failed. The trustees, in answer, stated that the rents of the buildings were being applied in reduction of the debt, and that when the debt was extinguished they hoped to get a new minister. Held that it had not been proved that the purposes of the trust had failed, and petition dismissed. Thomson v. Anderson, July 19, 1887, p. 1026.

COMPANY. Offence by Company—Complaint—Fine or imprisonment.

1. A statute making regulations for alkali works enacted that contraveners should be liable to certain fines, and failing payment of fines and costs, to imprisonment. A complaint against a limited company set forth that the company had contravened the statute in a certain way "whereby the company" had become liable to a fine and to imprisonment in the event of the fine and costs not being paid, and prayed the Court to convict the company of the contravention, and to adjudge it "to suffer the penalties provided" by the Act. Objection to the relevancy of the complaint, on the ground that the company was not liable to imprisonment, repelled. Fletcher v. Eglinton Chemical Co., Limited, Nov. 13, 1886, Just. Cases, p. 9.

COMPANY—Continued.

Offence by company—Liability of shareholders—Pharmacy Act, 1868 (31 and 32 Vict. c. 121), secs. 1 and 15.

2. A limited company carried on business as "Wholesale Chemists, Druggists, and Tea-merchants," doing both a wholesale and retail business. None of the shareholders was a duly qualified chemist and druggist under the Pharmacy Act, 1868, but the dispensing of drugs was done by duly qualified chemists and druggists. Held that the individual shareholders were not liable under sec. 1 and sec. 15 of the Act to be prosecuted for the offence of unlawfully taking and using the name chemists and druggists, and advertising the company as chemists and druggists. Bremridge v. Gray, July 20, 1887, Just. Cases, p. 60.

Slander by Company—Reparation.

3. Where the officials of a company had prepared and published, but without the authority, knowledge, or assent of the directors, a libellous circular concerning another company, and the latter company asked for interdict against the former circulating the document in question, the Court found that the publication and circulation by the officials of the defenders' company having been allowed to continue after the action was raised and the facts were brought to the knowledge of the directors, the pursuers were entitled to interdict. British Legal Life Assurance and Loan Co., Limited, v. Pearl Life Assurance Co., Limited, June 15, 1887, p. 818.
4. A company, or a private partnership may be sued for damages for slander, notwithstanding that malice must be proved against the defenders. Gordon v. British and Foreign Metaline Co., Nov. 16, 1886, p. 75.

Transfer of shares—"Unnecessary delay" in registering transfer—Rectification of register—Companies Act, 1862 (25 and 26 Vict. c. 89), sec. 35.

5. A shareholder transferred fifty shares in a company, the stock in which was then unsaleable, to his wife, whose sole separate estate consisted of an alimentary annuity of £150 a-year. The transfer was intimated to the company in December 1883. The transfer was not considered at the first meeting of directors, which took place in January, but at the next meeting, which took place in April, the directors, in the exercise of a power given to them by the articles of association, declined, without cause assigned, to register the transfer, and the rejection was communicated to the holder. In an action for payment of subsequent calls against the original shareholder, the defender maintained that in consequence of the unnecessary delay of the directors in dealing with the transfer he was no longer liable for calls. The defender also presented a petition for rectification of the register. Held (1) that there had been "unnecessary delay," in the sense of the 35th section of the Companies Act, 1862, in the directors not disposing of the transfer at their first meeting, but that this did not of itself entitle the defender to have the transfer registered; and (2) that although the defender might have been entitled to have the register rectified if he could have shewn that he had been prejudiced through the delay of the directors in dealing with the transfer, he had failed to instruct such prejudice, the shares having been unsaleable during the whole time. The Court therefore gave decree for the calls, and refused the petition. Property Investment Co. of Scotland, Limited, v. Duncan, Jan. 6, 1887, p. 299.

Transfer of shares—Company's lien over shares for debts due by shareholder.

6. A limited company, incorporated under the Companies Acts, has, at common law, a right of retention over the shares of a partner in security of debts due by him to the company. Bell's Trustee v. Coatbridge Tinplate Co., Limited, Dec. 17, 1886, p. 246.

COMPANY—Continued.

Winding-up by the Court—Creditors' petition—Disputed debt—Companies Act, 1862 (25 and 26 Vict. cap. 89), sec. 80.

7. In a petition for the compulsory winding-up of a limited company the petitioners alleged that the company was unable to pay its debts within the meaning of the 1st subsection of the 80th section of the Companies Act, 1862, two bills drawn by the petitioners and accepted by the company not having been paid when due. It appeared that the company had no other debts, and had large assets, and that there was a bona fide dispute between the parties relating to the sum contained in the bills in question, the respondents alleging that there was a large balance due to them. The Court dismissed the petition on consignment being made by the respondents, and found the petitioners liable in expenses. Cuninghame, &c., v. Walkinshaw Oil Co., Nov. 17, 1886, p. 87.

Winding-up by the Court—Creditor's petition—Security for debt—Companies Act, 1862 (25 and 26 Vict. cap. 89), sec. 80, subsec. 1.

8. Where a limited company, in answer to a creditor's petition for a winding-up order, on the ground of inability to pay a liquid debt under the 1st subsection of the 80th section of the Companies Act, 1862, pleads that the debt is sufficiently secured, the security must be such as will command in the market the amount of the debt founded on. Commercial Bank of Scotland, Limited, v. Lanark Oil Co., Limited, Dec. 2, 1886, p. 147.

Winding-up by the Court—Creditor's petition—Assets in America.

9. A petition having been presented by a creditor for the judicial winding-up of a company, which was admittedly insolvent, and for the appointment of a liquidator, answers were lodged by the company and certain secured creditors stating that all its assets were in America, and that, it being the intention to have a receiver appointed there, the appointment of a liquidator in this country was unnecessary. The creditors, other than the petitioner, were all either directors or concerned in the management of the company. The Court granted the prayer of the petition. Smyth & Co. v. Salem Flour Mills Co., Limited, Jan. 29, 1887, p. 441.

Winding-up by the Court—Where name of company struck off register by Registrar of Joint Stock Companies.

10. On 16th October 1886, a creditor of a limited company presented a petition for its winding-up, stating that it had suspended business for more than a year, and that it was unable to pay its debts. Three days after the petition had been presented, the Registrar of Joint Stock Companies struck the name of the company off the register, and notice of this was published in the Gazette of the same day; the effect being to dissolve the company as at that date, unless a winding-up order were granted on the petition, which would draw back to 16th October. The company could not be restored to the register except on an application to the Court by the company or by one of its members. The Court granted the petition. Alliance Heritable Security Co., Limited, Nov. 2, 1886, p. 34.

Winding-up subject to supervision—Objection by creditors to petition for.

11. A petition for a supervision order by the liquidator in a voluntary winding-up was objected to by a creditor of the company, on the ground that the winding-up would injuriously affect his rights. He also presented a petition on the same ground for recall of the resolution to wind up the company. Held that the objection was not relevant, and that the petition was incompetent.

The A company, limited, which carried on business as seedmen and nurserymen, agreed to transfer its seed business at a valuation to the B company, and to allow the latter to manage and realise the nurseries for a commission of 5 per cent on sales, reserving right to the A company to sell the nursery stock as a whole, and also agreed that the B company should, subject to the control of the A company, collect the whole debts due to the A company for a remuneration of 5 per cent. Two years afterwards the A company resolved to wind up voluntarily. In a petition by the A company and its liquidators for a supervision order the B company opposed the application, and presented a petition for recall of the resolutions to wind up, alleging that the liquidation was a device of the A company to get rid of the agreement; that it was perfectly solvent, and had no creditors pressing for payment, and that the respondents would, under the agreement, be able to recover more than sufficient to pay any sums due to them. Further, that if the object of the liquidation was the realisation of the A company's estates, they had agreed that the realisation should be effected by the B company, and that the latter had a right to conduct it. Held that the petition for recall was incompetent, and that the answers to the A company's petition for a supervision order were irrelevant. Lawson Seed and Nursery Co., Limited, v. Lawson & Son, Limited, Dec. 2, 1886, p. 154.

COMPANY—Continued.

Winding-up subject to supervision—Objections by shareholders to petition for.

12. At an extraordinary meeting of a limited company resolutions were carried by the statutory majority to the effect (1) that it had been proved to the satisfaction of the company that it could not, by reason of its liabilities, continue its business, and that it was advisable to wind it up; and (2) that the company should be wound up voluntarily. A petition to have the winding-up brought under the supervision of the Court having been presented, certain shareholders lodged answers objecting to the winding-up, on the ground (1) that the adoption of the resolution in question had been arranged as part of a scheme by certain shareholders to acquire the company estate for their own purposes; and (2) that the company was not unable to carry on its business. Held that these were not relevant answers to the petition, and supervision order granted. Monkland Iron Co., Limited, v. Dun, &c., Dec. 16, 1886, p. 242.

Winding-up subject to supervision—Confirmation of liquidator's appointment.

13. It is not proper in a petition for placing a winding-up under supervision of the Court to pray for confirmation of an appointment of a liquidator. Monkland Iron Co., Limited, v. Dun, &c., Dec. 16, 1886, p. 242.

Winding-up—Liquidator—Objection to appointment.

14. Question, whether averments that a liquidator appointed by a majority of shareholders at a statutory meeting at which a resolution to wind up had been carried was "conjunct and confident" with certain persons who had promoted the winding-up with a view to securing the property on their own terms, were relevant averments to justify the Court in removing him "on due cause shewn" in terms of the 141st section of the Companies Act, 1862. Monkland Iron Co., Limited, v. Dun, &c., Dec. 16, 1886, p. 242.

Winding-up—Sale of Assets.

15. Circumstances in which the liquidator of a company in liquidation under supervision was authorised to sell growing timber belonging to the company by private bargain. British Canadian Lumbering and Timber Co., Limited, Dec. 3, 1886, p. 160.

Winding-up—Process—Intimation—Companies Act, 1862 (25 and 26 Vict. cap. 89), sec. 100.

16. The liquidator of a company applied for an order under the 100th section of the Companies Act, 1862, on a former agent of the company, who was resident in Canada, to deliver up books and papers in his possession belonging to the company, and moved the Court to pronounce the order without intimation. The Court refused the motion, and ordered intimation. British Canadian Lumbering and Timber Co., Limited, Dec. 3, 1886, p. 160.

Winding-up—Expenses—Meetings of creditors with view to reconstruction of company—Companies Act, 1862 (25 and 26 Vict. cap. 89), sec. 156.

17. In a petition presented by certain creditors of a company in liquidation for an order under sec. 156 of the Companies Act, 1862, for access to the company's books, the petitioners obtained an order, and subsequently held meetings with a view to reconstruct the company. The scheme of reconstruction having proved abortive, held that the creditors were not entitled to their expenses out of the funds in the liquidation. Halden v. Liquidator of the Scottish Heritable Security Co., Limited, March 16, 1887, p. 633.

COMPANY—Continued.

COMPENSATION. Lease—Partial destruction of subject—Abatement of rent.

Held that a tenant is not bound to pay the full rent if, during possession, through no fault of his own, he loses the beneficial enjoyment of part of the subject let, and that his claim to abatement may be stated by way of defence to an action for payment of the full rent. Muir v. McIntyre, Feb. 4, 1887, p. 470.

See Bankruptcy, 9.

CONJUNCT FEE AND LIFERENT. See Succession, 2.CONTRACT. Pactum illicitum—Marriage with deceased wife's sister—Bona fides.

1. A Scotsman went through a ceremony of marriage with the sister of his deceased wife in Norway, where such marriages are legal. They returned to Scotland, and cohabited together there for about twelve years. They then entered into an agreement to separate, the man to pay the woman an annuity of £52 a-year. Held that this agreement was not struck at as being ob turpem causam. Webster v. Webster's Trustee, Nov. 17, 1886, p. 90.

Failure of consideration from supervening circumstances.

2. By written assignation Smith, an old man of eighty-two, the yearly tenant of a farm, on the narrative that from age he was unable to attend properly to business, agreed with Riddell, the husband of one of his nieces, "that during the remainder of my life the said James Riddell shall maintain and support me at bed, board, and lodging suitable to my station, and along with the said James Riddell and his family, to which I shall be considered to belong, and that whether I or the said James Riddell or both of us remain as tenant" of the farm or remove to another. In consideration Smith assigned and made over to Riddell "the lease and right of occupancy of the said farm, together with the whole stocking, crop, and other effects thereon, surrogating and substituting the said James Riddell in my full right and place of the premises, with full power to him to take and receive full possession of the said whole stocking, crop, and other effects as his own absolute property." Riddell signed the deed as consenting to and adopting it, and shortly thereafter, with his wife and family, went to reside in the farmhouse with Smith, and began to manage the farm; but before he had done so for six months, and before he had been accepted as tenant by the landlord, he died. His widow, as his executrix, claimed the stocking and crop. Held that as in consequence of Riddell's death his part of the agreement was incapable of fulfilment, his widow was not entitled to the stocking and crop, which remained the property of Smith. Smith v. Riddell, Nov. 18, 1886, p. 95.

Interpretation—Creditors making performance impossible.

3. The North British Railway Company, by an agreement entered into with the Duke of Abercorn to facilitate the passage of a bill promoted by them, agreed to buy 35 acres lying along the north side of their line at Portobello, including the site of a road running north and south across the land so acquired called Hope's Road. The company also agreed "whenever they take possession of any part of Hope's Road," to make a road "coloured yellow on a plan and according to section and specification hereto annexed," and to pay for the ground required at the rate of £400 per acre. This road was to run from east to west along the southern boundary of the Duke's ground and to lead at its eastern end into a road running parallel to Hope's Road. The agreement further provided,—“The Duke to have it in his option either to require of the railway company that this road be made, or that the cost of constructing said road, including the cost of the land at £400 per acre, and the cost of erecting larch fencing along north side of same, be paid to him in lieu thereof. Time of payment to be whenever the company take possession of any part of Hope's Road." A person coming in right of the Duke feued off his ground to different feuars up to the boundary of the company's property, and encroached inadvertently on that property, thus making it impossible to form the road stipulated for. Held that as the road, the formation of which was the basis of the whole article of the agreement, was not to be formed, those in right of the Duke could not demand from the company a sum equal to the cost of constructing or of fencing it. North British Railway Co. v. Benhar Coal Co., Dec. 1, 1886, p. 141.

CONTRACT—Continued.

Interpretation—Lease.

4. Lease to two persons and the survivor binding the tenants and their respective heirs and executors conjunctly and severally—Heirs of predeceaser held liable with survivor. Burns v. Martin, Feb. 14, 1887, H. L., p. 20.

Constitution—Joint adventure.

5. Correspondence which was held (rev. judgment of Lord Lee) not to constitute a contract of joint adventure, in respect it contained no termini habiles for determining the duration of the contract or its essential conditions. Young v. Dougans, Feb. 23, 1887, p. 490.

Error—Records—Plan—Partial reduction of a feu contract.

6. By a feu-contract the granter became bound to form certain roads on the ground disposed, in so far as delineated and tinged brown on a plan appended to the contract. On the plan appended a number of other roads were by mistake also tinged brown. The feu-contract, with the erroneously coloured plan, was duly recorded. None of the parties to the contract observed the blunder at the time of signing and it was not discovered until some years afterwards, when the ground had been sold by the original vassals to a building company. The company then raised an action against the superior for payment of the cost of forming the roads erroneously tinged brown on the plan, and the superior brought an action against the company for reduction of the feu-contract, in so far as it imported an obligation on him to form these roads. Held (rev. judgment of Lord Fraser) that as the original feu-contract was not intended to impose an obligation to make the roads in question on the superior, and as the company in contracting with the vassals did not stipulate for and did not understand that they were getting such an obligation, the mere fact that such an obligation erroneously appeared in the feu-contract and in the record did not entitle the company, though bona fide purchasers for value, to object to the Court rectifying the feu-contract and the records.

Observed (per Lord Young) that one purchasing on the faith of the records is not entitled to rely on the validity or subsistence of such incidental obligations as an obligation to make roads although appearing on the records undischarged. Glasgow Feuing and Building Co., Limited, v. Watson's Trustees, March 11, 1887, p. 610.

Innominate contract—Proof—Parole.

7. Question, whether, in an action of accounting between a principal and a commission agent, it was competent to prove by parole that the agent, in order to retain his principal's custom, had agreed in a particular transaction to pay a minimum sum as the price of the goods to be sold, whether that sum should be realised on sale or not. Reid v. Reid Brothers, June 8, 1887, p. 789.

Implied contract—Property—Nuisance—Acquiescence.

8. In 1868 the Commissioners of Police of a town, under the General Police Act of 1862, executed drainage works, in doing which they took advantage of a neighbouring proprietor's system of drainage, with his knowledge. Thereafter the quantity of sewage drained towards the proprietor's lands was greatly augmented. The sewage irrigation became unsatisfactory and was abandoned. In 1886 the proprietor, in consequence of the nuisance caused by the quantity of sewage sent upon his lands, raised an action against the Commissioners, concluding for declarator that the town was not entitled to send sewage upon the pursuer's lands, and for interdict. Held (1) that no contract by which the proprietor was bound to receive the town sewage upon his lands could be implied from the actings of parties; and (2) that he could not, by having allowed the drainage system of the town to be made so as to join his own, without objection, be held to have acquiesced in their sending sewage upon his lands in time coming, and therefore that he was entitled to decree of declarator and interdict as craved. Houldsworth v. Burgh of Wishaw, July 14, 1887, p. 920.

CONTRACT—Continued.

COPYRIGHT. Lectures in University.

1. Held that a professor in a university is entitled to prevent by interdict the publication of lectures delivered by him in his ordinary university course, such delivery not being equivalent to publication of the lectures. Caird v. Sime, June 13, 1887, H. L., p. 37.

Patents, Designs, and Trade-Marks Act, 1883 (46 and 47 Vict. cap. 57).

2. Design for the door of a kitchen range which was held on the evidence to be "a new or original design not previously published in the United Kingdom," and therefore a proper subject for registration under part 3, sec. 47, of the Patents, Designs, and Trade-Marks Act, 1883.

Held that where a design is registered for "shape or configuration," under sec. 60 of the Patents, Designs, and Trade-Marks Act, 1883, and a mechanical improvement is directly or incidentally secured by the adoption of such shape or configuration, the mechanical improvement is secured by the registration of the design, though it might have been made the subject of protection by letters-patent.

Held that a design may be made the subject of registration though it depict an article incomplete in itself, but which is intended to be used in combination with and as part of another article of manufacture.

Under sec. 52 of the Patents, Designs, and Trade-Marks Act, 1883, the public are barred from demanding inspection of the design from the comptroller until the copyright has ceased. Held that where an infringement of copyright is complained of, the alleged infringer is entitled to call on the holder of the copyright to prove for what purpose—whether pattern, shape, or ornament—the design was registered. Hunter, Walker, & Co. v. Falkirk Iron Co., July 20, 1887, p. 1072.

CROWN. See River, &c., 2, 3, 4, 5, 6.

DEPOSIT. Retention.

Held that a depositary was bound to restore to the depositor the balance that remained of a fund deposited to meet a contingent claim, when that claim had been ascertained and satisfied, and was not entitled to retain any part of the balance on the plea that he himself had a claim against the depositor for expenses incurred in ascertaining by arbitration the amount of the contingent claim to meet which the fund was deposited. M'Gregor v. Alley & M'Lellan, March 4, 1887, p. 535.

DESIGN. See Copyright, 2.

DILIGENCE. See Arrestment—Foreign, 3.

DISCHARGE. Where minor and pupil children recover damages—Guardianship of Infants Act, 1886 (49 and 50 Vict. cap. 26), sec. 2.

In an action of damages at the instance of children, some of whom were minors and others pupils, against a railway company for loss sustained by them through the death of their father, who was killed by an accident on the defenders' line, the defenders made a tender of £50 to each child, which was accepted. On a motion for decree, the defenders raised a question as to the capacity of the pursuers to grant a valid discharge. Held (1) that the mother of the children (sisted as a party in the cause, as tutor to the pupil children) could, under sec. 2 of the Guardianship of Infants Act, 1886, grant a valid discharge of the sums paid to the pupil children; and (2) that the minor children could themselves grant a valid discharge, and that the sums paid to them being of the nature of alimentary payments, and not capital sums for investment, it was not necessary, to secure against the risk of future challenge, to have a curator appointed to concur with them in the discharge. Jack, &c., v. North British Railway Co., Dec. 17, 1886, p. 263.

DISCHARGE—Continued.

DONATION. Husband and Wife.

1. A husband purchased certain heritable property, taking the title in favour of himself and his wife in conjunct liferent for her liferent use alienarily, and their children in fee, but under reservation of power to the husband at any time during his life, and without consent of his wife or children, "to sell, burden, wadset, and affect with debt, or even gratuitously dispose the subjects as if he were absolute proprietor of the same." There was no provision made for the wife by antenuptial contract or otherwise, and there was no allegation that the husband was not solvent at the date of the purchase. In an adjudication at the instance of a creditor of the husband, raised after his death, held that as the provisions for the wife and children were revocable by the husband at any time the subjects were not protected from his creditors. Honeyman & Wilson v. Robertson, &c., Dec. 7, 1886, p. 163.

Delivery—Trust—Policy of insurance in favour of wife and children.

2. Held (rev. judgment of Lord McLaren) that a policy of insurance taken by a husband in favour of trustees for behoof of his wife and the children of the marriage did not confer a vested right in the beneficiaries without delivery, actual or constructive, of the policy.

Circumstances which were held not to amount to delivery of a policy of insurance taken by a husband in favour of trustees for behoof of his wife and children. Jarvie's Trustee v. Jarvie's Trustees, Jan. 28, 1887, p. 411.

ELECTION. See Succession, 5, 6.ELECTION LAW. County Franchise—Long leaseholder—Joint tenant—Representation of the People Act, 1884 (48 and 49 Vict. cap. 3), sec. 4, subsec. 2.

1. The Reform Act of 1884 provides, sec. 4, subsec. 2, that "where two or more men are owners, either as joint tenants or as tenants in common, of an estate in any land or tenement, one of such men, but not more than one, shall, if his interest is sufficient," be entitled to be registered as a voter. Held (dub. Lord Mure) that this limitation applies to the case of joint tenants under a lease for a period exceeding fifty-seven years. Cuninghame v. Grossart, Nov. 26, 1886, p. 121.

County Franchise—Inhabitant-occupier—Change of Qualification.

2. Held that a person who had been for twelve months preceding 31st July in occupation of a dwelling-house in a county, but had removed from it in September, and was consequently not in occupation when the Sheriff came to consider his right at a Registration Court in October, fell to be struck off the roll, and that although he had removed to and then occupied another house in the same division of the county, and would have been entitled to be enrolled had he lodged a new claim. Smith v. McDonald, Nov. 26, 1886, p. 125.

County Franchise—Inhabitant-occupier—Service Franchise—"Dwelling-house"—Representation of the People Act, 1884 (48 and 49 Vict. c. 3), sec. 3.

3. A clerk in the employment of a hydropathic company occupied as sole occupant a room in the building belonging to the company. No particular room was expressly stipulated for by him, but when he entered on his employment a room was given to him which he had occupied for ten years; part of its furniture belonged to him. He took no meals in this room, but either in the servants' hall or the reception-room. During about four months in winter he left the room thus occupied by him and lived in a smaller and more comfortable room. No one occupied the other room in his absence; he was entitled to use it, and he moved from the one to the other of his own choice. The house-steward had a room in the building set apart for him, but usually resided in a separate house in the neighbouring village. Held that the clerk inhabited a "dwelling-house" in the sense of the 3d section of the Reform Act of 1884, and that the "dwelling-house" was not inhabited by any person under whom he served, and that therefore he was entitled to be registered. Ballingal v. Menzies, Nov. 26, 1886, p. 127.

ELECTION LAW—Continued.

ENTAIL. Limited and unlimited title—Consolidation.

1. An entail, dated in 1715, comprised, inter alia, certain lands the dominium utile of which had been disposed by the entailer or his predecessors prior to the date of the entail, so that the entail only carried the superiority thereof. The dominium utile was acquired in 1721 by the next succeeding heir of entail, who took a disposition in favour of himself and his heirs and assignees whomsoever, being a different destination from that contained in the entail. He was not infeft either under the entail or under the disposition. In 1765 the next heir was infeft upon the unexecuted precept in the conveyance of 1721, having previously served heir in general to the last heir. The next heir in 1780 made up a title under the entail, but no separate title to the said lands, which he possessed along with the entailed estate down to 1843, when he died. Held that consolidation had not operated so as to bring the dominium utile of the said lands within the entail, and that a subsequent heir was therefore proprietor thereof in fee-simple. Earl of Glasgow v. Boyle, Jan. 28, 1887, p. 419.

Disentail—Valuing of debts and provisions—Deductions from rental before ascertaining provisions—Rutherfurd Act, 1848 (11 and 12 Vict. cap. 36), sec. 6.

2. In a petition for disentail under the Rutherfurd Act, 1848, held in estimating the amount of security to be made prior to disentail, in respect of certain Aberdeen Act provisions, by the petitioner in favour of his wife and children, that (1) the rental of the year of disentail must be taken in place of the rental of the year of the granter's death, but that (2) deductions ought not to be made therefrom in respect of terminable rent charges, or in respect of a subsisting annuity in favour of the widow of a former proprietor; and (3) that in computing the amount of security to be granted for the annuity to the petitioner's wife no account should be taken of the children's provisions, nor any account of the widow's annuity in computing the security to be made for the children's provisions, and that security must be granted for the children's provisions to the maximum amount chargeable, although at the date of the disentail there were only two in existence. Earl of Glasgow, Nov. 12, 1886, p. 59.

Disentail—Value of next heir's expectancy—"Proper security"—Entail Amendment (Scotland) Act, 1875 (38 and 39 Vict. c. 61), sec. 5, subsec. 2 (b).

3. Held that the "proper security" to be given under the above Act must be such as a prudent lender would accept, and that, failing such security, the sum representing the value in question must be paid into bank.

Circumstances in which the Court held that "proper security" was not offered by the disentailling heir, and ordained the sum representing the value of the next heir's expectancy to be paid into bank. Farquharson v. Farquharson's Curator ad litem, Dec. 15, 1886, p. 231.

ERROR. Contract—Records—Plan—Partial reduction of a feu-contract.

1. By a feu-contract the granter became bound to form certain roads on the ground disposed, in so far as delineated and tinged brown on a plan appended to the contract. On the plan appended a number of other roads were by mistake also tinged brown. The feu-contract, with the erroneously coloured plan, was duly recorded. None of the parties to the contract observed the blunder at the time of signing, and it was not discovered until some years afterwards, when the ground had been sold by the original vassals to a building company. The company then raised an action against the superior for payment of the cost of forming the roads erroneously tinged brown on the plan, and the superior brought an action against the company for reduction of the feu-contract, in so far as it imported an obligation on him to form these roads. Held (rev. judgment of Lord Fraser) that as the original feu-contract was not intended to impose an obligation to make the roads in question on the superior, and as the company in contracting with the vassals did not stipulate for and did not understand that they were getting such an obligation, the mere fact that such obligation erroneously appeared in the feu-contract and in the record did not entitle the company, though bona fide purchasers for value, to object to the Court rectifying the feu-contract and the records.

ERROR—Continued.

Observed (per Lord Young) that one purchasing on the faith of the records is not entitled to rely on the validity or subsistence of such incidental obligations as an obligation to make roads although appearing on the records undischarged. Glasgow Feuing and Building Co., Limited, v. Watson's Trustees, March 11, 1887, p. 610.

Succession—Election.

2. A daughter, who had intimated to her father's trustees her election to take legitim in place of her testamentary provisions in the belief that her right to the whole legitim fund was admitted by the trustees, of whom her brother was one, subsequently, when her brother declared his intention to dispute her right to more than half of the legitim fund, withdrew her election and claimed her testamentary provisions. Held that she was not barred from doing so.

Opinion (per Lord Shand) that even if the error had been one of law, and whether induced by another or not, the daughter would have been entitled to withdraw her election. Inglis' Trustees v. Inglis, May 31, 1887, p. 740.

EXECUTOR. Heir and executor—By whom obligation of warrandice prestatable.

1. An obligation to free lands of debt arising under the warrandice clause of a disposition falls to be satisfied by the executor of the granter of the disposition in a question between him and the heir. Stirling Crawford's Trustees, Nov. 26, 1886, p. 131.

Whether trustee or executor—Trusts Act, 1861 (24 and 25 Vict. c. 84), sec. 1.

2. A testator in his will nominated certain persons as "executors," and directed them "to make and continue" certain annual payments to certain persons "till death or marriage," and to pay the liferent of his estate to his widow and a niece, and, on the death of the survivor of these two, to close their accounts at as early a date as practicable, and to divide the proceeds among specified persons. A "house, stable, and their fixtures," were to be sold soon after the testator's death. The executors were further directed to retain, or to realise for reinvestment, in their discretion, various securities, &c., held by him. There was no clause conveying any part of the estate to the executors. Held in a question between the co-executors, that though called "executors" in the deed, the executors were truly "gratuitous trustees nominated in a deed," and therefore were entitled to exercise the powers of assumption conferred on such trustees by sec. 1 of the Trusts Act, 1861. Ainslie, &c. v. Ainslie, Dec. 8, 1886, p. 209.

Sheriff—Jurisdiction.

3. Held that the fact that the confirmation of an executor to an estate has been taken out in the Sheriff Court of the deceased's domicile does not of itself subject the executors to the jurisdiction of that Court, and that an action will not lie against them if none of them is resident within that jurisdiction. Halliday's Executor v. Halliday's Executors, Dec. 17, 1886, p. 251.

EXECUTOR—Continued.

EXPENSES. Reparation—Vindication of character—Nominal damages.

1. In an action of damages for vindication of character, the jury found pursuer entitled to one farthing of damages. Circumstances in which pursuer held entitled to expenses. Bonnar v. Roden, June 1, 1887, p. 761.

Several defenders—Common defence.

2. Certain subfeuars from A were called and appeared as defenders, along with A, in an action by the over-superior for reduction of the feu-contract, quoad certain obligations imposed on him. With this action had been conjoined a petitory action by A alone against the over-superior for payment of a sum of money in respect of the non-implement of the obligations sought to be reduced. The defences of the subfeuars caused no additional expense. The over-superior having been successful in the conjoined actions, held (dis. Lord Young) that, having appeared as defenders in the action of reduction, the subfeuars were liable in expenses along with A. Glasgow Feuing and Building Co., Limited, v. Watson's Trustees, May 18, 1887, p. 718.

Company—Winding-up—Independent proceedings of creditors.

3. A scheme for the reconstruction of a public company in liquidation having proved abortive, held that the creditors by whom the scheme was promoted were not entitled to their expenses. Halden v. Liquidator of the Scottish Heritable Security Co., Limited, March 16, 1887, p. 633.

Husband and Wife—Administration of Justice and Appeals Act, 1808 (48 Geo. III. cap. 151), sec. 16.

4. Held that the condition imposed by sec. 16 of the above Act upon a person presenting a petition to be reponed against an interlocutor of a Lord Ordinary allowed to become final by mistake, that the petitioner shall be subjected in the payment of the expenses previously incurred in the process by the other party, was inapplicable where the petitioner was a wife seeking to be reponed in an action between her and her husband. Steedman v. Steedman, March 19, 1887, p. 682.

Skilled witnesses—Judge's certificate—Notice—A. S., 15th July 1876.

5. Held (1) that the Act of Sederunt, 15th July 1876, does not apply to causes in which the evidence is led before one of the Judges of a Division on a remit by the Division, and (2) that in such causes it is in the discretion of the Court to allow additional charges in respect of skilled witnesses on the motion for the approval of the Auditor's report.

Opinion (per Lord Craighill) that notice that an application is to be made for a certificate for skilled witnesses need not be given to the opposite party. Lord Elphinstone v. Monkland Iron and Coal Co., Feb. 2, 1887, p. 449.

Scientific witnesses—Certificate—A. S., 10th July 1844, sec. 4.

6. The Division before whom a proof has been brought upon a reclaiming note cannot certify the expenses of scientific witnesses under the Act of Sederunt of 10th July 1844, even in cases where the judgment of the Lord Ordinary has been reversed and the party found liable in expenses by him has been found entitled to expenses by the judgment of the Inner-House. Gibson v. West Lothian Oil Co., March 9, 1887, p. 578.

Service—Citation Amendment Act, 1882 (45 and 46 Vict. cap. 77).

7. In taxing an account of expenses the cost of service by an officer of Court will be allowed where the party cited does not reside in a postal delivery district, and it is improbable that a letter of citation will reach him. Macleod v. Davidson, Jan. 6, 1887, p. 298.

Arrestments on the dependence—Maritime cause.

8. Held that the expenses of arresting a ship on the dependence of an action and dismantling her are not recoverable by the pursuer as expenses of process. Black v. Jehangeer Framjee & Co., March 19, 1887, p. 678.

Expenses in Sheriff Court. See Sheriff, 5.

FISHINGS. Trawler—Reparation—Sea Fisheries Act, 1883 (46 and 47 Vict. cap. 22), sched. art. xix.

1. The Sea Fisheries Act, 1883, sched. art. xix., provides that, "where trawl fishermen are in sight of drift-net or long-line fishermen, they shall take all necessary steps in order to avoid doing injury to the latter. Where damage is caused, the responsibility shall be on the trawlers, unless they can prove that they were under the stress of compulsory circumstances, or that the loss sustained did not result from their fault." In an action of damages by fishermen against a trawler, held, after a proof, that the defenders had proved that the loss sustained did not result from their fault. Defenders therefore assolized. Leslies v. Walker, &c., Dec. 18, 1886, p. 288.

White fishings—Tidal and navigable river—Acts Anne, 1705, cap. 2, and 29 Geo. II. cap. 23.

2. A member of the public brought an action against the riparian proprietor concluding for declarator that he had a right to fish with single rod and line for floating white fish, including trout, flounders, eels, and any other sort of floating white fish which were not of the salmon kind, in that part of the river Doon where the tide ebbed and flowed, and as far as the highest point reached by the ordinary spring tides; and averred that the portion of the Doon so described extended from the sea to a distance of about 500 yards inland. The action was founded both on common law and the Acts of Anne, 1705, cap. 2, and 29 Geo. II. cap. 23. Held after a proof (1) that the Doon between the points in question was neither a tidal nor a navigable river, and that the pursuer was not entitled to declarator either at common law or under the statutes; and (2) that the defender under his titles had right to the whole fishings therein, and had had from time immemorial exclusive possession thereof. Defender therefore assolized. Bowie v. Marquis of Ailsa, March 18, 1887, p. 649.

Salmon fishing.

3. Size of mesh required by the Salmon Fisheries Act, 1868 (31 and 32 Vict. cap. 123), sec. 15, subsec. 4, schedule E. Mackenzie v. Pitcaithley, Feb. 18, 1887, Just. Cases, p. 19.

FOREIGN. Foreign decree—Prorogation of foreign jurisdiction.

1. A wife sued her husband in the English Courts under the Married Women's Property Act, 1882, and the action was compromised by an agreement between the parties, by which their respective rights in their properties were defined, and the husband undertook to make over certain property to his wife. The agreement bore that an order of Court should be taken to that effect. Thereafter the husband returned to France, where both spouses had been domiciled at the date of the marriage, and where he alleged he was still domiciled, and refused to implement the agreement. The wife raised an action in England to enforce implement, in which she obtained decree in absence. In an action in the Court of Session to enforce implement of this decree, held that the husband could not be heard to plead that the English Courts had no jurisdiction, in respect that he had prorogated their jurisdiction. Bank of Scotland v. Gudin, Dec. 8, 1886, p. 213.

Decree conform—Forum non conveniens—Husband and Wife.

2. A wife raised an action in the Court of Chancery against her husband to have certain property deposited in a bank in Scotland declared to belong to her in virtue of an antenuptial marriage-contract in French form, executed in France, where the parties were domiciled at the time. For some time before the raising of the action the spouses had been resident in England. The action was compromised by an agreement, providing, inter alia, that the parties should execute a deed of separation, and that the property in question should belong to the wife. The husband thereafter raised an action in France to have the agreement declared null as being ultra vires of the spouses. The wife obtained from the Court of Chancery a decree in absence ordaining implement of the agreement, and in Scotland raised a multiplepinding in name of the bank in which she claimed the property deposited. The husband, a competing claimant, pleaded that the action should be sisted to await the result of the action depending in France, as a more convenient forum for determining the question between the parties. Held that the wife was entitled to be preferred de plano. Bank of Scotland v. Gudin, Dec. 8, 1886, p. 213.

FOREIGN—Continued.

Judgments Extension Act, 1868 (31 and 32 Vict. c. 54), sec. 2.

3. Held that a certificate of a judgment of the "High Court of Justice, Queen's Bench Division, Liverpool District Registry," could be registered in the Books of Council and Session in terms of section 2 of the Judgments Extension Act, 1868.

Held that to entitle a creditor who holds a judgment of the High Court of Justice in England to register the same in Scotland, under section 2 of the Judgments Extension Act, 1868, to do diligence thereon, it is not necessary that the debtor should be subject to the jurisdiction of the Scottish Courts. English's Coasting and Shipping Co., Limited, v. British Finance Co., Limited, Dec. 10, 1886, p. 220.

See Bill of Exchange, 2—Meditatio Fugæ.

FORESHORE. See River, &c., 3, 4, 5, 6.

GUILD, DEAN OF. See Burgh, 2, 3, 4, 5.

HARBOUR. See Insurance, 3.

HEIR. See Executor, 1.

HUSBAND AND WIFE. Marriage with deceased wife's sister.

1. A Scotsman went through a ceremony of marriage with the sister of his deceased wife in Norway, where such marriages are legal. They returned to Scotland, and cohabited together there for about twelve years. They then entered into an agreement to separate, the man to pay the woman an annuity of £52 a-year. Held that this agreement was not struck at as being ob turpem causam. Webster v. Webster's Trustees, Nov. 17, 1886, p. 90.

Wife's capacity to contract—Promissory-note.

2. Held that the Married Women's Property Act, 1881, and the Bills of Exchange Act, 1882, do not give married women capacity to grant promissory-notes. M'Lean v. Angus Brothers, Feb. 2, 1887, p. 448.

Competency of evidence of wife of accused in public-house prosecution.

3. A public-house keeper, convicted of a breach of his certificate, appealed on the ground, inter alia, that he had tendered his wife as a witness, and her evidence had been rejected by the magistrates as incompetent. The Court, without deciding that the evidence of the wife of the accused in a public-house prosecution was in all circumstances incompetent, refused the appeal. Morrison v. Morrison, June 3, 1887, Just. Cases, p. 28.

Separation—Insanity.

4. Held that an action of separation at the instance of an insane wife is incompetent. Thomson v. Thomson, March 16, 1887, p. 634.

Divorce—Desertion.

5. Held that a wife who had left her husband's house on account of his drunken violence, and gone to live with her father, was not thereby barred from instituting an action of divorce on the ground of desertion. Gow v. Gow, Jan. 29, 1887, p. 443.

Divorce—Evidence.

6. Presumption pater est quem nuptiæ demonstrant. Steedman v. Steedman, July 20, 1887, p. 1066.

Process—Expenses—48 Geo. III. cap. 151.

7. Held that the condition imposed by sec. 16 of the above Act upon a person presenting a petition to be reponed against an interlocutor of a Lord Ordinary allowed to become final by mistake, that the petitioner shall be subjected in the payment of the expenses previously incurred in the process by the other party, was inapplicable where the petitioner was a wife seeking to be reponed in an action between her and her husband. Steedman v. Steedman, March 19, 1887, p. 682.

HUSBAND AND WIFE—Continued.

See Donation—Foreign, 1, 2—Marriage-contract—Succession, 2, 9, 10.

INSURANCE. Fire insurance—Right of postponed bondholder to recover when prior bondholder has received a sum sufficient to reinstate.

1. The proprietor of mills (which with the site were at least of the value of £10,000) granted bonds over them for £9000, and subsequently a postponed bond to another creditor for £900. Policies of fire insurance for £7000 were taken in name of the prior bondholders for behoof of themselves and of the owner in reversion. The postponed bondholder, an investment society, took a policy of fire insurance from another company for £900 in name of the society and of the owner "in reversion." The policy insured against damage by fire "the property described on the margin hereof." On the margin were set forth various items forming parts of the mills and machinery, with the specific sum insured on each. The owner paid the premiums of insurance.

A fire occurred, which damaged the mills and stopped the works. The holders of the prior bonds obtained under their policies of insurance the sum of £5668, which was sufficient to reinstate the works, but they applied it in reduction of their debt.

Subsequently the investment society raised an action, with consent and concurrence of the owner, against their insurers for declarator that the pursuers were entitled to be indemnified by the defenders against the loss they had sustained by the fire, and for payment. The defenders denied liability, on the ground that the loss caused by the fire had already been made good to the prior bondholders and the owner. It was admitted that at the date of the fire the subjects were of sufficient value to cover all the bonds, and that after the fire the subjects were not of sufficient value to meet the prior bonds.

Held (by a majority of the whole Court) that the defenders were bound under their contract to indemnify the investment society for the loss it had sustained by the fire.

Observed that the investment society, after receiving payment of the indemnity, would not be entitled either to recover the whole sum in the bond for their own benefit, or to give their debtor the benefit of their insurance by discharging any part of his debt, but were bound to give the insurers the benefit for their relief of such portion of their claim as had been satisfied by payment of the indemnity. Glasgow Provident Investment Society v. Westminster Fire Office, July 16, 1887, p. 947.

Life insurance—Policy of insurance in favour of wife and children.

2. Held (rev. judgment of Lord McLaren) that a policy of insurance taken by a husband in favour of trustees for behoof of his wife and the children of the marriage did not confer a vested right in the beneficiaries without delivery, actual or constructive, of the policy.

Circumstances which were held not to amount to delivery of a policy of insurance taken by a husband in favour of trustees for behoof of his wife and children. Jarvie's Trustee v. Jarvie's Trustees, Jan. 28, 1887, p. 411.

Marine insurance—Harbour—"Port."

3. In a marine policy of insurance the term "in port" must be construed according to the meaning put on the term by persons resorting to or doing business in the port.

Held (disa. Lord Shand, aff. judgment of Lord Trayner) that in a policy of insurance on a ship for the voyage, and "while in port thirty days after arrival," the meaning of the term "port," as applicable to the port of Greenock, did not include the fairway of the navigable channel of the river Clyde ex adverso of the harbour works.

Held (per Lord Trayner, Ordinary) that where a ship left a public dock in Greenock Harbour, and was laid up in a private graving dock, situated between two of the public docks belonging to the harbour trustees, for repairs, she had quitted the port of Greenock within the meaning of a policy of insurance for the voyage, and "while in port thirty days after arrival."

INSURANCE—Continued.

Opinions on the point reserved by the Lord President, Lord Mure, and Lord Adam.

Opinion contra (per Lord Shand). Owners of "Afton" v. Northern Marine Insurance Co., Limited, March 4, 1887, p. 544.

INTERDICT. Trespass—Right not insisted in.

1. In a petition by a proprietor of lands for interdict to prevent persons pasturing their cattle on his lands, the defenders, inter alia, pleaded on record that they had a right so to pasture their cattle. Subsequently, by minute, they stated that they never claimed, and did not now claim, such a right, but they made no motion to have the pleas asserting a right deleted from the record, although asked by the Court whether they proposed to do so. Held that the petitioner was entitled to interdict. Macleod v. Davidson, &c., Nov. 17, 1886, p. 92.

Procedure—Breach—Patent.

2. A, the holder of a patent, obtained interim interdict against B to prevent infringement. B did not object to the validity of the patent, but immediately thereafter assumed his son C as a partner with a view to manufacturing articles which A alleged were in infringement of his patent. A thereupon presented a petition and complaint against B and C for breach of interdict. B and C averred that the articles manufactured by them did not constitute an infringement, and further C challenged the validity of A's patent. Held (in conformity with Dudgeon v. Thomson and Donaldson, 3 R. 604 and 974, and 4 R. (H. L.) 88), (1) that it was competent to bring C into the process, though the interdict was not directed against him personally, and (2) that C was not entitled to a proof of his averments regarding the validity of the patent. Harvie v. W. & T. Ross, Nov. 13, 1886, p. 71.

See Justiciary Cases, 2.

JUDICIAL FACTOR. Appointment—Bankruptcy Act, 1856 (19 and 20 Vict. cap. 79), sec. 16.

1. The appointment of a judicial factor under the 16th section of the Bankruptcy Act, 1856, is not a matter of course, and ought to be made only where immediate measures for the preservation of the estate are necessary. Cuthbertson v. Gibson, May 31, 1887, p. 736.

Investment of funds—Loan over buildings in course of erection.

2. Buildings in course of erection are not a security on which a judicial factor is entitled to lend trust-funds.

Circumstances in which a judicial factor was held liable to make good a loss of trust-funds arising out of a loan over subjects in course of building, which afterwards proved insufficient to meet it. Guild v. Glasgow Educational Endowments Board, July 16, 1887, p. 944.

Investment of funds—Trusts Amendment Act, 1884 (47 and 48 Vict. c. 63).

3. A curator bonis, being a trustee in the meaning of the Trusts Amendment Act, 1884, is entitled to invest the funds in his hands as curator in the purchase of the stocks and in the loans authorised as trust investments by that Act, notwithstanding that the registration of his name as holder of these stocks cannot by the practice of the Bank of England, where a large number of these stocks are transferable, be qualified by any entry to shew the character in which he holds them, the Bank of England declining to take cognisance of trusts. Accountant of Court v. Crumpton's Curator Bonis, Nov. 12, 1886, p. 55.

Recall—Junior Lord Ordinary—Distribution of Business Act, 1857 (20 and 21 Vict. cap. 56), sec. 6.

4. Held (following Kyle, 24 D. 1083), that the appointment of a curator bonis made by the Junior Lord Ordinary, may competently be recalled by him. Tweedie, Dec. 8, 1886, p. 212.

JUDICIAL FACTOR—Continued.

5. Held by Lord Trayner (Ordinary) that a petition for recall of the appointment of a judicial factor may be competently presented to the Junior Lord Ordinary. Masterton v. Erskine's Trustees, May 14, 1887, p. 712.

Recall—Bankruptcy Act, 1856 (19 and 20 Vict. cap. 79), sec. 164.

6. At the instance of certain heritable creditors, a judicial factor was appointed under the 164th section of the Bankruptcy Act, 1856, upon the estate of a person deceased who had died intestate, and whose representatives, two brothers and a sister, were then in America. One of the brothers returned temporarily to Scotland, where he was decerned executor-dative, and the other sent instructions to have his title as heir made up. The brothers and sister then presented a petition for recall of the factor's appointment, but while the petition was pending the executor returned to America. The heritable creditors opposed the recall. The Court made a remit to the Accountant in Bankruptcy, who reported that it was doubtful whether the property would realise enough to pay off the bonds in full. The Court refused the petition for recall. Masterton v. Erskine's Trustees, May 14, 1887, p. 712.

See Minor, 1.

JURISDICTION. Exclusion of Courts of Law—Crofters Holdings (Scotland) Act, 1886 (49 and 50 Vict. cap. 29), sec. 6, subsec. 5.

1. Held, on a construction of the Crofters Holdings (Scotland) Act, 1886, particularly sec. 6, subsec. 5, thereof, that the jurisdiction of the ordinary Courts of law to grant decree for payment of arrears of rent is not suspended by the presentation of an application to the Commissioners under the Act to fix a fair rent and to deal with arrears. Fraser v. Macdonald, Dec. 7, 1886, p. 181.

Exclusion of Courts of Law—Volunteer Act, 1863 (26 and 27 Vict. cap. 65), secs. 24, 25, and 27.

2. Held that the rules for the management of the property, finances, and civil affairs of a corps, made and approved in terms of the Volunteer Act, 1863, may competently include rules providing for the payment of subscriptions by officers (both active and honorary) to the funds of the corps, and that such subscriptions so provided for may be recovered in a Court of law. Morrison v. Neilson, Feb. 2, 1887, p. 452.

Jurisdiction of Court of Session.

3. To review entries in a valuation-roll. Magistrates of Glasgow v. Hall, Jan. 14, 1887, p. 319.
4. To set aside a classification of lands and heritages under the Poor-Law Amendment Act, 1845 (8 and 9 Vict. cap. 83), sec. 36. North British Railway Co. v. Cardross Parochial Board, Feb. 17, 1887, p. 478.
5. To reduce a Debts Recovery decree. Robertson v. Pringle, Feb. 5, 1887, p. 474.

Meditatio fugæ—Execution abroad.

6. Held (1) that a meditatio fugæ warrant could not be put into execution furth of Scotland, and (2) that a creditor who had by means of such a warrant brought a debtor from England to Scotland was not entitled to avail himself of the fact that he had brought the debtor within the jurisdiction of the Courts of Scotland. Adam v. Crowe, June 14, 1887, p. 800.

See Burgh, 2, 3—Foreign—Process, 15, 16, 17—Sheriff, 1, 2, 3, 4.

JUSTICIARY CASES. Crimes—Culpable, reckless, and negligent steering—Collision—Indictment—Specification.

1. The masters of two steamers which had been in collision in the Clyde were charged in the River-Bailie Court of Glasgow on a single complaint with "culpable negligence and reckless conduct in navigating, directing, managing, or steering steam vessels, whereby a collision took place, and the lives of the lieges were endangered, actors or actor, or art and part, in so far as," at a time and place libelled, the accused "did both and each, or one or other of them, while said vessels were approaching each other, so culpably, negligently, and recklessly navigate, direct, manage, or steer' their vessels "as to bring or cause or permit them to come into violent collision with each other, whereby" the vessels were damaged and the lives of lieges endangered. The charge was found proven against one of the accused, who was fined £3, but against the other it was found not proven. Conviction quashed on the ground that the libel was irrelevant for want of specification of the fault said to have been committed. Clelland v. Sinclair, March 18, 1887, Just. Cases, p. 23.

JUSTICIARY CASES—Continued.

Crimes—Mobbing and Rioting—Deforcement.

2. An indictment charging the panels with mobbing and rioting and deforcement, in setting forth the modus which was applicable to both of the crimes charged, stated that the messenger-at-arms alleged to have been deforced had been instructed to serve a copy of a note of suspension and interdict and relative interlocutor upon a large number of persons, against whom the prayer of the note was directed, and that the interlocutor was in these terms, "To see and answer within fourteen days: Reserving as to interdict in the meantime"—(with no order for intimation or service). The indictment further bore that the messenger having for the purpose of serving a copy of the note on each of the persons concerned proceeded to the farm of A and there having served copies on certain persons, and having thereafter proceeded towards B for the purpose of serving the remaining copies, a mob at or near A assembled for the purpose of preventing him from fulfilling his duty of serving these copies, and by threats and acts of violence deforced the officer. The panels were charged with forming part of the mob. Objections to the relevancy of the indictment—on the grounds (1) that the duty in which the messenger was said to be engaged when deforced was the service of a copy of the note of suspension and interdict and not of the note itself; (2) that the interlocutor founded on was not a legal warrant, as it contained no express order for intimation; and (3) that the deforcement was alleged to have taken place not when the officer was actually engaged in serving, but after he had served his writs at A and before he reached B, where the remainder were to be served—repelled. Her Majesty's Advocate v. McLean, Oct. 18, 1886, Just. Cases, p. 1.

Crimes—Theft—Customer carrying off goods on credit against will of seller.

3. A shopkeeper refused to sell certain goods to one of his customers, unless the customer paid for the goods before delivery. To this the customer agreed, but after the shopkeeper had weighed the goods the customer, who was under the influence of drink, took violent possession of them, and carried them off without payment of the price, 3s., notwithstanding the remonstrances of the shopkeeper. The customer was convicted of theft of the goods. Conviction quashed. Clyne v. Keith, March 18, 1887, Just. Cases, p. 22.

Statutory offences—Poaching—Farm-servant killing rabbits under authority from his master—Day Trespass Act (2 and 3 Will. IV. c. 68)—Ground Game Act, 1880 (43 and 44 Vict. c. 47).

4. Held that rabbits not being game at common law, a farm-servant snaring rabbits under verbal authority from his master on his master's farm cannot be convicted of trespass in pursuit of conies under the Day Trespass Act, and that the provisions of the Ground Game Act, 1880, sec. 1, subsec. 1, requiring written authority from the occupier to kill ground game, did not apply. Jack v. Nairne, Feb. 18, 1887, Just. Cases, p. 20.

Statutory offences—Salmon Fisheries Act, 1868 (31 and 32 Vict. c. 123), sec. 15, subsec. 4—Bye-law, schedule E.

5. Size of mesh. Mackenzie v. Pitcaithley, Feb. 18, 1887, Just. Cases, p. 19.

Statutory offences—Ship—Employment of person as master who has no certificate—Merchant Shipping Act, 1854 (17 and 18 Vict. cap. 104), sec. 136.

6. The 136th section of the Merchant Shipping Act, 1854, enacts that no ship shall proceed to sea unless the master thereof has a valid certificate under the Act, and that any person who employs any person as master without ascertaining that he is possessed of such a certificate shall incur a penalty. In a complaint against the owner of a whaling ship for a contravention of the above section, it was held proved by the Sheriff that the accused had employed on board, nominally as icemaster, a person who possessed great experience as a navigator among ice, and as a whale fisher, but had no certificate under the Merchant Shipping Acts, and also another person, nominally as master, who held a master's certificate but was without experience in the two respects named; that, acting under the instructions of the accused, the icemaster assumed the command of the ship from the time she left Scotland till she was abandoned in the Arctic Seas; that he was considered by the crew as master, occupied the master's berth, and with a single exception gave all the orders, although several of the crew deposed that they would have considered themselves bound in law to obey the certificated master in preference to him; that it was requisite that the person in command should have some special knowledge of ice navigation, and that it would not have been safe to have entrusted the command to a certificated master, however good, who was not possessed of such knowledge; and that the certificated master was entered in the ship's books as master, and signed the articles as such, the icemaster being designed as "icemaster, in full charge." The Sheriff convicted the accused. On appeal the Court quashed the conviction. Healop v. Cadenhead, June 4, 1887, Just. Cases, p. 35.

JUSTICIARY CASES—Continued.

Statutory Offences—Failure to educate children—Education Act, 1872 (35 and 36 Vict. cap. 62), sec. 70—Education Act, 1883 (46 and 47 Vict. cap. 56), secs. 9 and 10.

7. In order to a prosecution under the Education Acts, 1872 and 1883, for failure to educate children, it is essential that there should be produced either a certificate of failure to educate under section 70 of the Act of 1872, or an attendance order under sections 9 and 10 of that of 1883. Macaulay v. Macdonald, June 4, 1887, Just. Cases, p. 43.

Statutory offences—Locomotive on Highway—Locomotive Act, 1861 (24 and 25 Vict. cap. 70), sec. 6—Locomotives Amendment Act, 1878 (41 and 42 Vict. cap. 58).

8. A bridge on a highway may be stopped for locomotive traffic by a bye-law relating to it passed under the powers given by the Locomotives Amendment Act, 1878, by the road authorities of the district, and, after the advertisement specified in that Act, duly confirmed; and, therefore, a complaint alleging a contravention of such bye-law does not require to libel the Locomotives Act, 1861, or to set forth that, as required by section 6 of that Act, a notice was placed at the bridge itself that it was insufficient for the ordinary traffic of the district. Cadenhead v. Milne, July 14, 1887, Just. Cases, p. 58.

Statutory offences—Sunday Trading—Act 1661, cap. 18.

9. Observations on the question whether the Act 1661, cap. 18, was in desuetude. Nicol v. McNeill, July 13, 1887, Just. Cases, p. 47.

Statutory Offences—Sale of Drugs—Limited Company—Pharmacy Act, 1868 (31 and 32 Vict. c. 121), secs. 1 and 15.

10. A limited company carried on business as "Wholesale Chemists, Druggists, and Tea-merchants," doing both a wholesale and retail business. None of the shareholders was a duly qualified chemist and druggist under the Pharmacy Act, 1868, but the dispensing of drugs was done by duly qualified chemists and druggists. Held that the individual shareholders were not liable under sec. 1 and sec. 15 of the Act to be prosecuted for the offence of unlawfully taking and using the name chemists and druggists, and advertising the company as chemists and druggists. Bremridge v. Gray, July 20, 1887, Just. Cases, p. 60.

Statutory offences.

11. Public-house and police offences. See Public-House and Police, 1.

JUSTICIARY CASES—Continued.Procedure—Proof.

12. A declaration taken on a charge of assault and mobbing and rioting and breach of the peace held to be competent evidence against the accused in a trial for breach of the peace only. Macdougall v. MacLulich, Feb. 18, 1887, Just. Cases, p. 17.
13. Competency of evidence of accused in a customs prosecution. Dodsworth v. Rijnbergen, Dec. 15, 1886, p. 238.
14. Competency of evidence of wife of accused in a public-house prosecution. Morrison v. Morrison, June 3, 1887, Just. Cases, p. 28.

Review—Summary Prosecutions Appeals (Scotland) Act, 1875 (38 and 39 Vict. c. 62).

15. An appellant is not entitled to raise on the facts stated in a case under the Summary Prosecutions Appeals Act, 1875, any question of law to which he has not specially directed the attention of the inferior Judge in requiring the case to be stated. Macdougall v. MacLulich, Feb. 18, 1887, Just. Cases, p. 17.

Review—Summary Prosecutions Appeals Act, 1875 (38 and 39 Vict. c. 62), sec. 3, subsec. (1)—Lodging of bond of caution.

16. In a case under the Summary Prosecutions Appeals Act, 1875, it was stated that the bond of caution required by the Act only reached the Sheriff-clerk's office by post on the morning after the statutory period of three days had expired. The Sheriff-substitute stated the case, leaving the question of the competency open as one of the questions of law for the opinion of the Court. The appellant's counsel opened the case on the merits without any objection on the part of the respondents to the competency of the appeal. Held that the facts in regard to the lodging of the bond of caution and the relative question of law were not competently part of the case, and that in the circumstances the Court would not entertain the objection to the competency of the appeal.

Opinion (per Lord Young) that if a bond of caution had not been timeously lodged owing to mishap not attributable to the fault of the appellant, the Court might give relief against the mishap. Thom v. Caledonian Railway Co., Nov. 12, 1886, Just. Cases, p. 5.

Review—Amendment of incompetent sentence—Summary Prosecutions Appeals Act, 1875 (38 and 39 Vict. cap. 62), sec. 3.

17. A Sheriff sitting in the Summary Court sentenced a person to pay a fine of £1, 1s., and ordained him to find caution to the amount of £10 for twelve months. In an appeal, held (diss. Lord Craighill) that it was competent for the Court to amend the sentence to the effect of restricting the period of caution to six months. Macbeath v. Fraser, Nov. 20, 1886, Just. Cases, p. 16.

Objections to inferior Court proceedings—Jurisdiction—Competency of Summary Complaint—Sheriff—Alkali, &c., Works Regulations Act, 1881 (44 and 45 Vict. cap. 37).

18. Held that proceedings for recovering the fines imposed by the Alkali, &c., Works Regulation Act, 1881, fall within the Sheriff's criminal jurisdiction, and are competently brought by way of complaint under the Summary Jurisdiction Acts, 1864 and 1881. Fletcher v. Eglinton Chemical Co., Limited, Nov. 13, 1886, Just. Cases, p. 9.

Objections to inferior Court proceedings—Jurisdiction—Competency of Summary complaint—Sunday Trading—Act, 1861, cap. 18.

19. A complaint in a Police Court at the instance of the procurator-fiscal charging a contravention of the Act 1861, cap. 18, "for the due observance of the Sabbath-day," set forth that the accused was "liable, on conviction, to pay a penalty of £10 in Scots money, or 16s. 8d. in sterling money, and failing payment of said penalty, is liable to be exemplarily punished in his person, namely, to be imprisoned for any period not exceeding twenty days," and prayed that the accused should be punished "according to law." The complaint did not bear to proceed under any of the statutes relating to summary procedure. The evidence of the witnesses was recorded, and the recorded depositions were signed by the respective witnesses and by the presiding magistrate. The accused was convicted. On a suspension, conviction quashed, per the Lord Justice-General, Lord Young, and Lord M'Laren, on the ground that the case of Bute v. More, Nov. 24, 1870, 1 Coup. 495, 9 Macph. 180, decided that a summary complaint for a contravention of the Act 1661, cap. 18, was incompetent, and per the Lord Justice-Clerk, Lord Mure, Lord Craighill, and Lord M'Laren, on the ground that, even if a summary complaint were competent, the present complaint could not be sustained, not being brought under the Summary Jurisdiction Acts, 1864 and 1881. Nicol v. M'Neill, July 13, 1887, Just. Cases, p. 47.

JUSTICIARY CASES—Continued.

Objections to inferior Court proceedings—Jurisdiction—Alleged competition of civil right—Day poaching.

20. A person charged on a summary complaint with day poaching produced a written permission by a burgh to shoot "over the lands belonging to" the burgh, and alleged that the locus libelled in the complaint formed part of the lands belonging to the burgh. The burgh declined to state whether they claimed the ground in question as their property, and it was not disputed that it was in the occupation of one of the complainer's tenants. The Sheriff-substitute dismissed the complaint in respect that it involved a question of civil right. On an appeal, held that no question of civil right was involved, and case remitted to the Sheriff-substitute to be tried. Scott v. Thomson, June 4, 1887, Just. Cases, p. 45.

Objections to inferior Court proceedings—Complaint—Fine or imprisonment—Limited Company.

21. A complaint against a limited company set forth that the company had contravened a statute in a certain way, "whereby the company" had become liable to a fine and to imprisonment in the event of the fine and costs not being paid, and prayed the Court to convict the company of the contravention, and to adjudge it "to suffer the penalties provided" by the Act. Objection to the relevancy of the complaint, on the ground that a company was not liable to imprisonment, repelled. Fletcher v. Eglinton Chemical Co., Limited, Nov. 13, 1886, Just. Cases, p. 9.

Objection to inferior Court proceedings—Oppression—Railway—Travelling without proper ticket.

22. A bye-law of a railway company provided that "any passenger using or attempting to use a ticket on any day for which such ticket is not available, or using a ticket which has been already used on a previous journey, is hereby subjected to a penalty not exceeding forty shillings." Held that the bye-law was only applicable to cases where an attempt was made to cheat the company, and that it was oppressive to prosecute for the penalty when there was no such attempt. Thom v. Caledonian Railway Co., Nov. 12, 1886, Just. Cases, p. 5.

Objections to inferior Court proceedings—Penalty—Modification.

23. In a prosecution for an offence against the Public Houses Acts brought under the Edinburgh Police Act, 1879, and not under the Summary Jurisdiction Acts of 1864 and 1881, the magistrate may competently exercise the power conferred by the Summary Jurisdiction Act, 1881, sec. 6, subsec. A, to impose a modified penalty. Linton v. Sherry, June 4, 1887, Just. Cases, p. 46.

LEASE. Lease to two persons and the survivor—Respective heirs bound conjunctly and severally.

1. In a lease in favour of two persons and the survivor the tenants bound "themselves and their respective heirs, executors, and successors, all conjunctly and severally, renouncing the benefit of discussion, to pay" the rent to the landlord. Held (in rev. judgment of Second Division) that on the death of one of the tenants his representatives became jointly and severally liable with the survivor for the rent till the termination of the lease. Burns v. Martin, Feb. 14, 1887, H. L., p. 20.

LEASE—Continued.

Partial destruction of subject—Abatement—Retention of rent—Liquid and illiquid.

2. Held that a tenant is not bound to pay the full rent if, during possession, through no fault of his own, he loses the beneficial enjoyment of part of the subject let, and that his claim to abatement may be stated by way of defence to an action for payment of the full rent. Muir v. McIntyre, Feb. 4, 1887, p. 470.

Hypothec.

3. The landlord's hypothec does not extend to articles sent to a commission-agent for exhibition as samples. Pulsometer Engineering Co., Limited, v. Gracie, Jan. 14, 1887, p. 316.

Removing—Title to sue.

4. The estates of A were sequestrated in 1876, and his trustee sold to B his right and interest in an inn (which he held of the proprietor under a verbal lease). The trustee granted an assignation of the rents under declaration that "I have no title to the said subjects" beyond the act and warrant, and that "I will not be bound to give any, there being no written title or right either in me or in the said A, the subjects being possessed merely at the will of the proprietor." A continued in possession of the inn till his death in April 1886. In March 1886 B had raised an action of removing against him, which was in dependence at the date of his death. In May 1886 B presented a petition in the Sheriff Court for a warrant for the summary ejection of A's widow, in which he averred that he was proprietor of the subjects occupied by the defender, and founded on the assignation as his title. On this petition the Sheriff found that A's widow had no right or title to occupy the subjects, and granted warrant for her removal. A's widow brought a suspension thereof in the Court of Session. In his answers B averred that after the date of the assignation A occupied the subjects as his tenant under a verbal agreement to that effect. The Court (diss. Lord Shand, aff. judgment of Lord McLaren) refused B a proof of his averments of tenancy, and suspended the proceedings complained of, on the ground that B had no title to sue the removing. Sinclair v. Leslie, June 9, 1887, p. 792.

Agricultural Holdings Act, 1883 (46 and 47 Vict. c. 62), secs. 28, 35, and 42.

5. Held that the Agricultural Holdings (Scotland) Act, 1883, did not apply to the case of a hotel and 30 acres of land let together as one subject. Macintosh v. Lord Lovat, Dec. 18, 1886, p. 282.

Agricultural Holdings Act, 1883 (46 and 47 Vict. cap. 62), secs. 1, 36, and 42—Compensation for unexhausted improvements—Renunciation.

6. Held that a renunciation of a lease by a tenant, accepted by the landlord, did not bar the tenant from recovering compensation for unexhausted improvements under the Agricultural Holdings Act, 1883. Strang v. Stuart, March 16, 1887, p. 637.

Agricultural Holdings Act, 1883 (46 and 47 Vict. cap. 62), sec. 7—Compensation for unexhausted improvements—Notice.

7. The Agricultural Holdings Act, 1883, requires a tenant who claims compensation from his landlord for unexhausted improvements to give notice of his claim four months before the termination of his tenancy. Held that, in the case of leases which terminate at Martinmas for the arable land, and six months later for the houses and grass, notice given four months before the latter term is sufficient notice. Strang v. Stuart, March 16, 1887, p. 637.

Crofters Holdings Act, 1886 (49 and 50 Vict. cap. 29), sec. 6, subsec. 5.

8. Held, on a construction of the Crofters Holdings (Scotland) Act, 1886, particularly sec. 6, subsec. 5, thereof, that the jurisdiction of the ordinary Courts of law to grant decree for payment of arrears of rent is not suspended by the presentation of an application to the Commissioners under the Act to fix a fair rent and to deal with arrears. Fraser v. Macdonald, Dec. 7, 1886, p. 181.

See Contract, 2.

LEGITIM. See Succession, 8.

MARRIAGE-CONTRACT. Provision to husbands—Implied condition.

A husband by his antenuptial marriage-contract made certain provisions for his wife "if she shall survive him," and she on the other part conveyed to him "and his heirs and assignees whomsoever, All and Sundry the whole means and effects, heritable and moveable . . . now belonging or indebted and owing to her . . . and all that she may acquire or succeed to during the subsistence of the said intended marriage, or that shall be belonging, owing, and indebted to her at the time of her death, with the exception of the provisions above made in her favour." The marriage was dissolved by the death of the husband, and the wife subsequently acquired considerable funds, and then died intestate. Held that the conveyance by the wife in favour of her husband, and his heirs and assignees, was subject to the implied condition that he should survive her. Russell's Trustees, June 30, 1887, p. 849.

MASTER AND SERVANT. See Reparation, 10 to 15.

MEDITATIO FUGÆ. Execution in a foreign country.

Held (1) that a meditatio fugæ warrant could not be put into execution furth of Scotland, and (2) that a creditor who had by means of such a warrant brought a debtor from England to Scotland was not entitled to avail himself of the fact that he had brought the debtor within the jurisdiction of the Courts of Scotland. Adam v. Crowe, June 14, 1887, p. 800.

MINES AND MINERALS. Clay—Compulsory sale—Water-Works Clauses Act, 1847 (10 and 11 Vict. c. 17)—Railways Clauses Act, 1845 (8 and 9 Vict. c. 33).

1. Held (diss. Lord Mure, rev. judgment of Lord M'Laren) that the provision of the Water-Works Clauses Act, 1847, excluding from conveyances of lands purchased under the Act (when not expressly included) "mines of coal, iron-stone, slate, or other minerals" applied to minerals of every kind which the seller might find it profitable to work, and therefore applied to ordinary clay having a commercial value. Magistrates of Glasgow v. Farie, Jan. 21, 1887, p. 346.

Support to adjacent surface.

2. A proprietor of lands sold the surface, reserving the minerals and right to work the same "upon payment to the proprietors of the ground of what loss and damage they shall sustain thereby upon the land." He then worked out the whole of an upper seam of coal by stoop-and-room. Subsequently he sold a lower seam to a person who worked out the coal therein, leaving, however, a solid mass of coal unworked beneath and fifty yards round a steading which belonged to the owner of the surface. That steading having been damaged by subsidence of the ground, caused by the withdrawal of the lateral support in the lower seam, the owner of the surface raised an action against the owner of the lower seam and his tenant, in which the defenders pleaded that they were not liable for the damage in respect that it was due to the previous working in the upper seam, and that the defenders had left the subjacent support entirely unworked, and were not bound to give support a latere. Held that the pursuer was entitled to damages from the defenders on the ground that the original proprietor of the minerals after working out the upper seam could not have wrought the lower without being liable for the damage resulting therefrom, and could not transmit his right without that liability. White's Trustees v. Duke of Hamilton, March 10, 1887, p. 597.

MINOR AND PUPIL. Power to grant discharge—Guardianship of Infants Act, 1886 (49 and 50 Vict. cap. 26), sec. 2.

1. In an action of damages at the instance of children, some of whom were minors and others pupils, against a railway company for loss sustained by them through the death of their father, who was killed by an accident on the defenders' line, the defenders made a tender of £50 to each child, which was accepted. On a motion for decree, the defenders raised a question as to the capacity of the pursuers to grant a valid discharge. Held (1) that the mother of the children (sisted as a party in the cause, as tutor to the pupil children) could, under sec. 2 of the Guardianship of Infants Act, 1886, grant a valid discharge of the sums paid to the pupil children; and (2) that the minor children could themselves grant a valid discharge, and that the sums paid to them being of the nature of alimentary payments, and not capital sums for investment, it was not necessary, to secure against the risk of future challenge, to have a curator appointed to concur with them in the discharge. Jack, &c., v. North British Railway Co., Dec. 17, 1886, p. 263.

MINOR AND PUPIL—Continued.

Heritable bond by tutor.

2. A bond granted by a tutor over his ward's estate is null. Scott's Trustees v. Scott, July 19, 1887, p. 1043.

MORA. Poor—Assessment—Classification.

1. In 1846 a parochial board, with the approval of the Board of Supervision, adopted a classification of lands and heritages for occupants' rates into "(1) lands let for farming, (2) houses let as dwelling-houses and shops," the former being assessed at one-sixth of their full value, the latter at their full value. At that date there were no railways in the parish, but a railway was constructed in 1850. It was assessed in Class II., and continued to be so assessed without objection until 1886. Held in a declarator at the instance of the railway company against the parochial board that the pursuers were not barred by mora and acquiescence from having it declared that the classification was invalid in respect it was not exhaustive. North British Railway Co. v. Cardross Parochial Board, Feb. 17, 1887, p. 478.

Parent and child—Illegitimate child—Aliment.

2. In 1863 a woman was delivered of an illegitimate child in her father's house. The putative father admitted the paternity, and until the child was four years old made contributions in name of aliment to its maternal grandfather, with whom it continued to live. He then made an offer to take the child to his own house, which both its mother and its maternal grandfather declined. Thereafter the father contributed little or nothing towards the child's support. It continued to live with its grandfather till its seventeenth year, when it went to its mother. The maternal grandfather died in 1883, without having made any demand on the father in respect of the child's aliment. In 1886 the mother raised an action for payment of a sum in name of inlying expenses and of aliment down to the child's thirteenth year. Held that in the circumstances the pursuer was not entitled to recover, and defender assolized. Westlands v. Pirie, June 1, 1887, p. 763.

Transaction between trustees and beneficiaries.

3. Action raised in 1886 for reduction of a deed dated in 1852, under which the trust-estate had been conveyed by the beneficiaries to the trustees, as was averred, without adequate consideration, held not to have been timeously raised. Buckner v. Jopp's Trustees, July 16, 1887, p. 1006.

NOBILE OFFICIUM. See Burgh, 1, 8—Process, 17—Trust, 4, 5, 14, 15.

NUISANCE. Dean of Guild—Jurisdiction.

1. The Dean of Guild having refused to sanction the erection within burgh of a byre for the accommodation of twelve cows on the ground that it was likely to create a nuisance, on appeal the Court, doubting the Dean of Guild's jurisdiction to entertain the question of nuisance, sisted the process to enable the objectors to bring an interdict against the erection of the building in question. This having been done, after proof the interdict was refused, and in respect thereof the Dean of Guild's interlocutor in the other process was recalled, and a remit made to him to proceed with the lining. Manson v. Forrest, June 14, 1887, p. 802.
2. The surveyor of a burgh objected to warrant being granted by the Dean of Guild Court for the increase of certain stabling accommodation belonging to a carriage-hirer, on the ground that the buildings proposed to be enlarged were in the middle of a square of buildings densely populated, and that the smell and noise from them would constitute a nuisance, and that the danger of fire in the district would be increased by them. The Dean of Guild having allowed a proof as to these objections, the petitioner appealed, and maintained that they related only to the use of the proposed building and to alleged nuisance, which were beyond the jurisdiction of the Dean of Guild. The Court (diss. Lord Rutherford Clark) refused the appeal on the ground that it was expedient that the facts should be ascertained before determining whether the questions raised by the objections fell within the jurisdiction of the Dean of Guild. Robertson v. Thomas, June 17, 1887, p. 822.

NUISANCE—Continued.

Restriction in feu-contract.

3. Opinions as to the effect of a stipulation in a feu-contract against the erection upon the feu of any house "for the carrying on any trade or manufacture which may operate as a nuisance to the neighbouring feuars." Manson v. Forrest, June 14, 1887, p. 802.

Erection of byre in burgh.

4. Held that the business of cowkeeping may be so conducted and regulated within burgh as not to be a nuisance.

Circumstances in which the Court refused to grant interdict against the erection of a byre for twelve cows within burgh—the cowkeeper having come under an undertaking to regulate his business so as in the view of the Court to obviate the possibility of its creating a nuisance to the neighbouring proprietors. Manson v. Forrest, June 14, 1887, p. 802.

Property—Implied contract—Acquiescence.

5. The proprietor of an estate adjoining a town, part of which was built on land feued from him, constructed sewers so as to carry to his lands, for the purpose of irrigation, the sewage of that part of the town, and he made settling-ponds and other works on his estate for that purpose. In 1868 the Commissioners of Police of the town, which had adopted the General Police Act of 1862, executed drainage works, in doing which they took advantage of the proprietor's system of drainage, with his knowledge, connecting some of their drains with his sewers and settling-ponds. Thereafter the town increased, and the quantity of sewage drained towards the proprietor's lands was thus greatly augmented. The sewage irrigation became unsatisfactory, and was abandoned. In 1886 the proprietor, in consequence of the nuisance caused by the quantity of sewage sent upon his lands, raised an action against the Commissioners, concluding for declarator that the town was not entitled to send sewage upon the pursuer's lands, and for interdict. Held (1) that no contract by which the proprietor was bound to receive the town sewage upon his lands could be implied from the actings of parties; and (2) that he could not, by having allowed the drainage system of the town to be made so as to join his own without objection, be held to have acquiesced in their sending sewage upon his lands in time coming, and therefore that he was entitled to decree of declarator and interdict as craved. Houldsworth v. Burgh of Wishaw, July 14, 1887, p. 920.

PARENT AND CHILD. Pater est quem nuptiæ demonstrant.

1. The presumption pater est quem nuptiæ demonstrant may be rebutted by evidence which satisfies the Court that the husband was not the father.

Circumstances in which the Court held that the presumption was rebutted, although the husband and wife at the time of the child's conception resided in the same village. Steedman v. Steedman, July 20, 1887, p. 1066.

Illegitimate child—Aliment.

2. Held (diss. Lord Young) that a bastard son is liable to support his mother. Samson v. Davis, Nov. 26, 1886, p. 113.

INSURANCE—Continued.

repairs, she had quitted the port of Greenock within the meaning of a policy of insurance for the voyage, and "while in port thirty days after arrival"

Opinions on the point reserved by the Lord President, Lord Mure, and Lord Adam.

Opinion contra (per Lord Shand). Owners of "Afton" v. Northern Marine Insurance Co., Limited, March 4, 1887, p. 544.

INTERDICT. Trespass—Right not insisted in.

1. In a petition by a proprietor of lands for interdict to prevent persons pasturing their cattle on his lands, the defenders, inter alia, pleaded on record that they had a right so to pasture their cattle. Subsequently, by minute, they stated that they never claimed, and did not now claim, such a right, but they made no motion to have the pleas asserting a right deleted from the record, although asked by the Court whether they proposed to do so. Held that the petitioner was entitled to interdict. MacLeod v. Davidson, &c., Nov. 17, 1886, p. 92.

Procedure—Breach—Patent.

2. A, the holder of a patent, obtained interim interdict against B to prevent infringement. B did not object to the validity of the patent, but immediately thereafter assumed his son C as a partner with a view to manufacturing articles which A alleged were in infringement of his patent. A thereupon presented a petition and complaint against B and C for breach of interdict. B and C averred that the articles manufactured by them did not constitute an infringement, and further C challenged the validity of A's patent. Held (in conformity with Dudgeon v. Thomson and Donaldson, 3 R. 604 and 974, and 4 R. (H. L.) 88), (1) that it was competent to bring C into the process, though the interdict was not directed against him personally, and (2) that C was not entitled to a proof of his averments regarding the validity of the patent. Harvie v. W. & T. Ross, Nov. 13, 1886, p. 71.

See Justiciary Cases, 2.

JUDICIAL FACTOR. Appointment—Bankruptcy Act, 1856 (19 and 20 Vict. cap. 79), sec. 16.

1. The appointment of a judicial factor under the 16th section of the Bankruptcy Act, 1856, is not a matter of course, and ought to be made only where immediate measures for the preservation of the estate are necessary. Cuthbertson v. Gibson, May 31, 1887, p. 736.

Investment of funds—Loan over buildings in course of erection.

2. Buildings in course of erection are not a security on which a judicial factor is entitled to lend trust-funds.

Circumstances in which a judicial factor was held liable to make good a loss of trust-funds arising out of a loan over subjects in course of building, which afterwards proved insufficient to meet it. Guild v. Glasgow Educational Endowments Board, July 16, 1887, p. 944.

Investment of funds—Trusts Amendment Act, 1884 (47 and 48 Vict. c. 63).

3. A curator bonis, being a trustee in the meaning of the Trusts Amendment Act, 1884, is entitled to invest the funds in his hands as curator in the purchase of the stocks and in the loans authorised as trust investments by that Act, notwithstanding that the registration of his name as holder of these stocks cannot by the practice of the Bank of England, where a large number of these stocks are transferable, be qualified by any entry to shew the character in which he holds them, the Bank of England declining to take cognisance of trusts. Accountant of Court v. Crumpton's Curator Bonis, Nov. 12, 1886, p. 55.

Recall—Junior Lord Ordinary—Distribution of Business Act, 1857 (20 and 21 Vict. cap. 56), sec. 6.

4. Held (following Kyle, 24 D. 1083), that the appointment of a curator bonis made by the Junior Lord Ordinary, may competently be recalled by him. Tweedie, Dec. 8, 1886, p. 212.

JUDICIAL FACTOR—Continued.

5. Held by Lord Trayner (Ordinary) that a petition for recall of the appointment of a judicial factor may be competently presented to the Junior Lord Ordinary. Masterton v. Erskine's Trustees, May 14, 1887, p. 712.

Recall—Bankruptcy Act, 1856 (19 and 20 Vict. cap. 79), sec. 164.

6. At the instance of certain heritable creditors, a judicial factor was appointed under the 164th section of the Bankruptcy Act, 1856, upon the estate of a person deceased who had died intestate, and whose representatives, two brothers and a sister, were then in America. One of the brothers returned temporarily to Scotland, where he was decerned executor-dative, and the other sent instructions to have his title as heir made up. The brothers and sister then presented a petition for recall of the factor's appointment, but while the petition was pending the executor returned to America. The heritable creditors opposed the recall. The Court made a remit to the Accountant in Bankruptcy, who reported that it was doubtful whether the property would realise enough to pay off the bonds in full. The Court refused the petition for recall. Masterton v. Erskine's Trustees, May 14, 1887, p. 712.

See Minor, 1.

JURISDICTION. Exclusion of Courts of Law—Crofters Holdings (Scotland) Act, 1886 (49 and 50 Vict. cap. 29), sec. 6, subsec. 5.

1. Held, on a construction of the Crofters Holdings (Scotland) Act, 1886, particularly sec. 6, subsec. 5, thereof, that the jurisdiction of the ordinary Courts of law to grant decree for payment of arrears of rent is not suspended by the presentation of an application to the Commissioners under the Act to fix a fair rent and to deal with arrears. Fraser v. Macdonald, Dec. 7, 1886, p. 181.

Exclusion of Courts of Law—Volunteer Act, 1863 (26 and 27 Vict. cap. 65), secs. 24, 25, and 27.

2. Held that the rules for the management of the property, finances, and civil affairs of a corps, made and approved in terms of the Volunteer Act, 1863, may competently include rules providing for the payment of subscriptions by officers (both active and honorary) to the funds of the corps, and that such subscriptions so provided for may be recovered in a Court of law. Morrison v. Neilson, Feb. 2, 1887, p. 452.

Jurisdiction of Court of Session.

3. To review entries in a valuation-roll. Magistrates of Glasgow v. Hall, Jan. 14, 1887, p. 319.
4. To set aside a classification of lands and heritages under the Poor-Law Amendment Act, 1845 (8 and 9 Vict. cap. 83), sec. 36. North British Railway Co. v. Cardross Parochial Board, Feb. 17, 1887, p. 478.
5. To reduce a Debts Recovery decree. Robertson v. Pringle, Feb. 5, 1887, p. 474.

Meditatio fugæ—Execution abroad.

6. Held (1) that a meditatio fugæ warrant could not be put into execution forth of Scotland, and (2) that a creditor who had by means of such a warrant brought a debtor from England to Scotland was not entitled to avail himself of the fact that he had brought the debtor within the jurisdiction of the Courts of Scotland. Adam v. Crowe, June 14, 1887, p. 800.

See Burgh, 2, 3—Foreign—Process, 15, 16, 17—Sheriff, 1, 2, 3, 4.

JUSTICIARY CASES. Crimes—Culpable, reckless, and negligent steering—Collision—Indictment—Specification.

1. The masters of two steamers which had been in collision in the Clyde were charged in the River-Bailie Court of Glasgow on a single complaint with "culpable negligence and reckless conduct in navigating, directing, managing, or steering steam vessels, whereby a collision took place, and the lives of the lieges were endangered, actors or actor, or art and part, in so far as," at a time and place libelled, the accused "did both and each, or one or other of them, while said vessels were approaching each other, so culpably, negligently, and recklessly navigate, direct, manage, or steer' their vessels "as to bring or cause or permit them to come into violent collision with each other, whereby" the vessels were damaged and the lives of lieges endangered. The charge was found proven against one of the accused, who was fined £3, but against the other it was found not proven. Conviction quashed on the ground that the libel was irrelevant for want of specification of the fault said to have been committed. Clelland v. Sinclair, March 18, 1887, Just. Cases, p. 23.

JUSTICIARY CASES—Continued.

Crimes—Mobbing and Rioting—Deforcement.

2. An indictment charging the panels with mobbing and rioting and deforcement, in setting forth the modus which was applicable to both of the crimes charged, stated that the messenger-at-arms alleged to have been deforced had been instructed to serve a copy of a note of suspension and interdict and relative interlocutor upon a large number of persons, against whom the prayer of the note was directed, and that the interlocutor was in these terms, "To see and answer within fourteen days: Reserving as to interdict in the meantime"—(with no order for intimation or service). The indictment further bore that the messenger having for the purpose of serving a copy of the note on each of the persons concerned proceeded to the farm of A and there having served copies on certain persons, and having thereafter proceeded towards B for the purpose of serving the remaining copies, a mob at or near A assembled for the purpose of preventing him from fulfilling his duty of serving these copies, and by threats and acts of violence deforced the officer. The panels were charged with forming part of the mob. Objections to the relevancy of the indictment—on the grounds (1) that the duty in which the messenger was said to be engaged when deforced was the service of a copy of the note of suspension and interdict and not of the note itself; (2) that the interlocutor founded on was not a legal warrant, as it contained no express order for intimation; and (3) that the deforcement was alleged to have taken place not when the officer was actually engaged in serving, but after he had served his writs at A and before he reached B, where the remainder were to be served—repelled. Her Majesty's Advocate v. McLean, Oct. 18, 1886, Just. Cases, p. 1.

Crimes—Theft—Customer carrying off goods on credit against will of seller.

3. A shopkeeper refused to sell certain goods to one of his customers, unless the customer paid for the goods before delivery. To this the customer agreed, but after the shopkeeper had weighed the goods the customer, who was under the influence of drink, took violent possession of them, and carried them off without payment of the price, 3s., notwithstanding the remonstrances of the shopkeeper. The customer was convicted of theft of the goods. Conviction quashed. Clyne v. Keith, March 18, 1887, Just. Cases, p. 22.

Statutory offences—Poaching—Farm-servant killing rabbits under authority from his master—Day Trespass Act (2 and 3 Will. IV. c. 68)—Ground Game Act, 1880 (43 and 44 Vict. c. 47).

4. Held that rabbits not being game at common law, a farm-servant snaring rabbits under verbal authority from his master on his master's farm cannot be convicted of trespass in pursuit of conies under the Day Trespass Act, and that the provisions of the Ground Game Act, 1880, sec. 1, subsec. 1, requiring written authority from the occupier to kill ground game, did not apply. Jack v. Nairne, Feb. 18, 1887, Just. Cases, p. 20.

Statutory offences—Salmon Fisheries Act, 1868 (31 and 32 Vict. c. 123), sec. 15, subsec. 4—Bye-law, schedule E.

5. Size of mesh. Mackenzie v. Pitcaithley, Feb. 18, 1887, Just. Cases, p. 19.

Statutory offences—Ship—Employment of person as master who has no certificate—Merchant Shipping Act, 1854 (17 and 18 Vict. cap. 104), sec. 136.

6. The 136th section of the Merchant Shipping Act, 1854, enacts that no ship shall proceed to sea unless the master thereof has a valid certificate under the Act, and that any person who employs any person as master without ascertaining that he is possessed of such a certificate shall incur a penalty. In a complaint against the owner of a whaling ship for a contravention of the above section, it was held proved by the Sheriff that the accused had employed on board, nominally as icemaster, a person who possessed great experience as a navigator among ice, and as a whale fisher, but had no certificate under the Merchant Shipping Acts, and also another person, nominally as master, who held a master's certificate but was without experience in the two respects named; that, acting under the instructions of the accused, the icemaster assumed the command of the ship from the time she left Scotland till she was abandoned in the Arctic Seas; that he was considered by the crew as master, occupied the master's berth, and with a single exception gave all the orders, although several of the crew deposed that they would have considered themselves bound in law to obey the certificated master in preference to him; that it was requisite that the person in command should have some special knowledge of ice navigation, and that it would not have been safe to have entrusted the command to a certificated master, however good, who was not possessed of such knowledge; and that the certificated master was entered in the ship's books as master, and signed the articles as such, the icemaster being designed as "icemaster, in full charge." The Sheriff convicted the accused. On appeal the Court quashed the conviction. Healop v. Cadenhead, June 4, 1887, Just. Cases, p. 35.

JUDICIARY CASES—Continued.

Statutory Offences—Failure to educate children—Education Act, 1872 (35 and 36 Vict. cap. 62), sec. 70—Education Act, 1883 (46 and 47 Vict. cap. 56), secs. 9 and 10.

7. In order to a prosecution under the Education Acts, 1872 and 1883, for failure to educate children, it is essential that there should be produced either a certificate of failure to educate under section 70 of the Act of 1872, or an attendance order under sections 9 and 10 of that of 1883. Macaulay v. Macdonald, June 4, 1887, Just. Cases, p. 43.

Statutory offences—Locomotive on Highway—Locomotive Act, 1861 (24 and 25 Vict. cap. 70), sec. 6—Locomotives Amendment Act, 1878 (41 and 42 Vict. cap. 58).

8. A bridge on a highway may be stopped for locomotive traffic by a bye-law relating to it passed under the powers given by the Locomotives Amendment Act, 1878, by the road authorities of the district, and, after the advertisement specified in that Act, duly confirmed; and, therefore, a complaint alleging a contravention of such bye-law does not require to libel the Locomotives Act, 1861, or to set forth that, as required by section 6 of that Act, a notice was placed at the bridge itself that it was insufficient for the ordinary traffic of the district. Cadenhead v. Milne, July 14, 1887, Just. Cases, p. 58.

Statutory offences—Sunday Trading—Act 1661, cap. 18.

9. Observations on the question whether the Act 1661, cap. 18, was in desuetude. Nicol v. McNeill, July 13, 1887, Just. Cases, p. 47.

Statutory Offences—Sale of Drugs—Limited Company—Pharmacy Act, 1868 (31 and 32 Vict. c. 121), secs. 1 and 15.

10. A limited company carried on business as "Wholesale Chemists, Druggists, and Tea-merchants," doing both a wholesale and retail business. None of the shareholders was a duly qualified chemist and druggist under the Pharmacy Act, 1868, but the dispensing of drugs was done by duly qualified chemists and druggists. Held that the individual shareholders were not liable under sec. 1 and sec. 15 of the Act to be prosecuted for the offence of unlawfully taking and using the name chemists and druggists, and advertising the company as chemists and druggists. Bremridge v. Gray, July 20, 1887, Just. Cases, p. 60.

Statutory offences.

11. Public-house and police offences. See Public-House and Police, 1.

JUSTICIARY CASES—Continued.

Procedure—Proof.

12. A declaration taken on a charge of assault and mobbing and rioting and breach of the peace held to be competent evidence against the accused in a trial for breach of the peace only. Macdougall v. MacLulich, Feb. 18, 1887, Just. Cases, p. 17.
13. Competency of evidence of accused in a customs prosecution. Dodsworth v. Rijnbergen, Dec. 15, 1886, p. 238.
14. Competency of evidence of wife of accused in a public-house prosecution. Morrison v. Morrison, June 3, 1887, Just. Cases, p. 28.

Review—Summary Prosecutions Appeals (Scotland) Act, 1875 (38 and 39 Vict. c. 62).

15. An appellant is not entitled to raise on the facts stated in a case under the Summary Prosecutions Appeals Act, 1875, any question of law to which he has not specially directed the attention of the inferior Judge in requiring the case to be stated. Macdougall v. MacLulich, Feb. 18, 1887, Just. Cases, p. 17.

Review—Summary Prosecutions Appeals Act, 1875 (38 and 39 Vict. c. 62), sec. 3, subsec. (1)—Lodging of bond of caution.

16. In a case under the Summary Prosecutions Appeals Act, 1875, it was stated that the bond of caution required by the Act only reached the Sheriff-clerk's office by post on the morning after the statutory period of three days had expired. The Sheriff-substitute stated the case, leaving the question of the competency open as one of the questions of law for the opinion of the Court. The appellant's counsel opened the case on the merits without any objection on the part of the respondents to the competency of the appeal. Held that the facts in regard to the lodging of the bond of caution and the relative question of law were not competently part of the case, and that in the circumstances the Court would not entertain the objection to the competency of the appeal.

Opinion (per Lord Young) that if a bond of caution had not been timeously lodged owing to mishap not attributable to the fault of the appellant, the Court might give relief against the mishap. Thom v. Caledonian Railway Co., Nov. 12, 1886, Just. Cases, p. 5.

Review—Amendment of incompetent sentence—Summary Prosecutions Appeals Act, 1875 (38 and 39 Vict. cap. 62), sec. 3.

17. A Sheriff sitting in the Summary Court sentenced a person to pay a fine of £1, 1s., and ordained him to find caution to the amount of £10 for twelve months. In an appeal, held (diss. Lord Craighill) that it was competent for the Court to amend the sentence to the effect of restricting the period of caution to six months. Macbeath v. Fraser, Nov. 20, 1886, Just. Cases, p. 16.

Objections to inferior Court proceedings—Jurisdiction—Competency of Summary Complaint—Sheriff—Alkali, &c., Works Regulations Act, 1881 (44 and 45 Vict. cap. 37).

18. Held that proceedings for recovering the fines imposed by the Alkali, &c., Works Regulation Act, 1881, fall within the Sheriff's criminal jurisdiction, and are competently brought by way of complaint under the Summary Jurisdiction Acts, 1864 and 1881. Fletcher v. Eglinton Chemical Co., Limited, Nov. 13, 1886, Just. Cases, p. 9.

Objections to inferior Court proceedings—Jurisdiction—Competency of Summary complaint—Sunday Trading—Act, 1861, cap. 18.

19. A complaint in a Police Court at the instance of the procurator-fiscal charging a contravention of the Act 1861, cap. 18, "for the due observation of the Sabbath-day," set forth that the accused was "liable, on conviction, to pay a penalty of £10 in Scots money, or 16s. 8d. in sterling money, and failing payment of said penalty, is liable to be exemplarily punished in his person, namely, to be imprisoned for any period not exceeding twenty days," and prayed that the accused should be punished "according to law." The complaint did not bear to proceed under any of the statutes relating to summary procedure. The evidence of the witnesses was recorded, and the recorded depositions were signed by the respective witnesses and by the presiding magistrate. The accused was convicted. On a suspension, conviction quashed, per the Lord Justice-General, Lord Young, and Lord M'Laren, on the ground that the case of Bute v. More, Nov. 24, 1870, 1 Coup. 495, 9 Macph. 180, decided that a summary complaint for a contravention of the Act 1661, cap. 18, was incompetent, and per the Lord Justice-Clerk, Lord Mure, Lord Craighill, and Lord M'Laren, on the ground that, even if a summary complaint were competent, the present complaint could not be sustained, not being brought under the Summary Jurisdiction Acts, 1864 and 1881. Nicol v. M'Neill, July 13, 1887, Just. Cases, p. 47.

JUSTICIARY CASES—Continued.

Objections to inferior Court proceedings—Jurisdiction—Alleged competition of civil right—Day poaching.

20. A person charged on a summary complaint with day poaching produced a written permission by a burgh to shoot "over the lands belonging to" the burgh, and alleged that the locus libelled in the complaint formed part of the lands belonging to the burgh. The burgh declined to state whether they claimed the ground in question as their property, and it was not disputed that it was in the occupation of one of the complainer's tenants. The Sheriff-substitute dismissed the complaint in respect that it involved a question of civil right. On an appeal, held that no question of civil right was involved, and case remitted to the Sheriff-substitute to be tried. Scott v. Thomson, June 4, 1887, Just. Cases, p. 45.

Objections to inferior Court proceedings—Complaint—Fine or imprisonment—Limited Company.

21. A complaint against a limited company set forth that the company had contravened a statute in a certain way, "whereby the company" had become liable to a fine and to imprisonment in the event of the fine and costs not being paid, and prayed the Court to convict the company of the contravention, and to adjudge it "to suffer the penalties provided" by the Act. Objection to the relevancy of the complaint, on the ground that a company was not liable to imprisonment, repelled. Fletcher v. Eglinton Chemical Co., Limited, Nov. 13, 1886, Just. Cases, p. 9.

Objection to inferior Court proceedings—Oppression—Railway—Travelling without proper ticket.

22. A bye-law of a railway company provided that "any passenger using or attempting to use a ticket on any day for which such ticket is not available, or using a ticket which has been already used on a previous journey, is hereby subjected to a penalty not exceeding forty shillings." Held that the bye-law was only applicable to cases where an attempt was made to cheat the company, and that it was oppressive to prosecute for the penalty when there was no such attempt. Thom v. Caledonian Railway Co., Nov. 12, 1886, Just. Cases, p. 5.

Objections to inferior Court proceedings—Penalty—Modification.

23. In a prosecution for an offence against the Public Houses Acts brought under the Edinburgh Police Act, 1879, and not under the Summary Jurisdiction Acts of 1864 and 1881, the magistrate may competently exercise the power conferred by the Summary Jurisdiction Act, 1881, sec. 6, subsec. A, to impose a modified penalty. Linton v. Sherry, June 4, 1887, Just. Cases, p. 46.

LEASE. Lease to two persons and the survivor—Respective heirs bound conjunctly and severally.

1. In a lease in favour of two persons and the survivor the tenants bound "themselves and their respective heirs, executors, and successors, all conjunctly and severally, renouncing the benefit of discussion, to pay" the rent to the landlord. Held (in rev. judgment of Second Division) that on the death of one of the tenants his representatives became jointly and severally liable with the survivor for the rent till the termination of the lease. Burns v. Martin, Feb. 14, 1887, H. L., p. 20.

LEASE—Continued.

Partial destruction of subject—Abatement—Retention of rent—Liquid and illiquid.

2. Held that a tenant is not bound to pay the full rent if, during possession, through no fault of his own, he loses the beneficial enjoyment of part of the subject let, and that his claim to abatement may be stated by way of defence to an action for payment of the full rent. Muir v. McIntyre, Feb. 4, 1887, p. 470.

Hypothec.

3. The landlord's hypothec does not extend to articles sent to a commission-agent for exhibition as samples. Pulsometer Engineering Co., Limited, v. Gracie, Jan. 14, 1887, p. 316.

Removing—Title to sue.

4. The estates of A were sequestrated in 1876, and his trustee sold to B his right and interest in an inn (which he held of the proprietor under a verbal lease). The trustee granted an assignation of the rents under declaration that "I have no title to the said subjects" beyond the act and warrant, and that "I will not be bound to give any, there being no written title or right either in me or in the said A, the subjects being possessed merely at the will of the proprietor." A continued in possession of the inn till his death in April 1886. In March 1886 B had raised an action of removing against him, which was in dependence at the date of his death. In May 1886 B presented a petition in the Sheriff Court for a warrant for the summary ejection of A's widow, in which he averred that he was proprietor of the subjects occupied by the defender, and founded on the assignation as his title. On this petition the Sheriff found that A's widow had no right or title to occupy the subjects, and granted warrant for her removal. A's widow brought a suspension thereof in the Court of Session. In his answers B averred that after the date of the assignation A occupied the subjects as his tenant under a verbal agreement to that effect. The Court (diss. Lord Shand, aff. judgment of Lord McLaren) refused B a proof of his averments of tenancy, and suspended the proceedings complained of, on the ground that B had no title to sue the removing. Sinclair v. Leslie, June 9, 1887, p. 792.

Agricultural Holdings Act, 1883 (46 and 47 Vict. c. 62), secs. 28, 35, and 42.

5. Held that the Agricultural Holdings (Scotland) Act, 1883, did not apply to the case of a hotel and 30 acres of land let together as one subject. Macintosh v. Lord Lovat, Dec. 18, 1886, p. 282.

Agricultural Holdings Act, 1883 (46 and 47 Vict. cap. 62), secs. 1, 36, and 42—Compensation for unexhausted improvements—Renunciation.

6. Held that a renunciation of a lease by a tenant, accepted by the landlord, did not bar the tenant from recovering compensation for unexhausted improvements under the Agricultural Holdings Act, 1883. Strang v. Stuart, March 16, 1887, p. 637.

Agricultural Holdings Act, 1883 (46 and 47 Vict. cap. 62), sec. 7—Compensation for unexhausted improvements—Notice.

7. The Agricultural Holdings Act, 1883, requires a tenant who claims compensation from his landlord for unexhausted improvements to give notice of his claim four months before the termination of his tenancy. Held that, in the case of leases which terminate at Martinmas for the arable land, and six months later for the houses and grass, notice given four months before the latter term is sufficient notice. Strang v. Stuart, March 16, 1887, p. 637.

Crofters Holdings Act, 1886 (49 and 50 Vict. cap. 29), sec. 6, subsec. 5.

8. Held, on a construction of the Crofters Holdings (Scotland) Act, 1886, particularly sec. 6, subsec. 5, thereof, that the jurisdiction of the ordinary Courts of law to grant decree for payment of arrears of rent is not suspended by the presentation of an application to the Commissioners under the Act to fix a fair rent and to deal with arrears. Fraser v. Macdonald, Dec. 7, 1886, p. 181.

See Contract, 2.

LEGITIM. See Succession, 8.

MARRIAGE-CONTRACT. Provision to husbands—Implied condition.

A husband by his antenuptial marriage-contract made certain provisions for his wife "if she shall survive him," and she on the other part conveyed to him "and his heirs and assignees whomsoever, All and Sundry the whole means and effects, heritable and moveable . . . now belonging or indebted and owing to her . . . and all that she may acquire or succeed to during the subsistence of the said intended marriage, or that shall be belonging, owing, and indebted to her at the time of her death, with the exception of the provisions above made in her favour." The marriage was dissolved by the death of the husband, and the wife subsequently acquired considerable funds, and then died intestate. Held that the conveyance by the wife in favour of her husband, and his heirs and assignees, was subject to the implied condition that he should survive her. Russell's Trustees, June 30, 1887, p. 849.

MASTER AND SERVANT. See Reparation, 10 to 15.

MEDITATIO FUGÆ. Execution in a foreign country.

Held (1) that a meditatio fugæ warrant could not be put into execution furth of Scotland, and (2) that a creditor who had by means of such a warrant brought a debtor from England to Scotland was not entitled to avail himself of the fact that he had brought the debtor within the jurisdiction of the Courts of Scotland. Adam v. Crowe, June 14, 1887, p. 800.

MINES AND MINERALS. Clay—Compulsory sale—Water-Works Clauses Act, 1847 (10 and 11 Vict. c. 17)—Railways Clauses Act, 1845 (8 and 9 Vict. c. 33).

1. Held (diss. Lord Mure, rev. judgment of Lord M'Laren) that the provision of the Water-Works Clauses Act, 1847, excluding from conveyances of lands purchased under the Act (when not expressly included) "mines of coal, iron-stone, slate, or other minerals" applied to minerals of every kind which the seller might find it profitable to work, and therefore applied to ordinary clay having a commercial value. Magistrates of Glasgow v. Farie, Jan. 21, 1887, p. 346.

Support to adjacent surface.

2. A proprietor of lands sold the surface, reserving the minerals and right to work the same "upon payment to the proprietors of the ground of what loss and damage they shall sustain thereby upon the land." He then worked out the whole of an upper seam of coal by stoop-and-room. Subsequently he sold a lower seam to a person who worked out the coal therein, leaving, however, a solid mass of coal unworked beneath and fifty yards round a steading which belonged to the owner of the surface. That steading having been damaged by subsidence of the ground, caused by the withdrawal of the lateral support in the lower seam, the owner of the surface raised an action against the owner of the lower seam and his tenant, in which the defenders pleaded that they were not liable for the damage in respect that it was due to the previous working in the upper seam, and that the defenders had left the subjacent support entirely unworked, and were not bound to give support a latere. Held that the pursuer was entitled to damages from the defenders on the ground that the original proprietor of the minerals after working out the upper seam could not have wrought the lower without being liable for the damage resulting therefrom, and could not transmit his right without that liability. White's Trustees v. Duke of Hamilton, March 10, 1887, p. 597.

MINOR AND PUPIL. Power to grant discharge—Guardianship of Infants Act, 1886 (49 and 50 Vict. cap. 26), sec. 2.

1. In an action of damages at the instance of children, some of whom were minors and others pupils, against a railway company for loss sustained by them through the death of their father, who was killed by an accident on the defenders' line, the defenders made a tender of £50 to each child, which was accepted. On a motion for decree, the defenders raised a question as to the capacity of the pursuers to grant a valid discharge. Held (1) that the mother of the children (sisted as a party in the cause, as tutor to the pupil children) could, under sec. 2 of the Guardianship of Infants Act, 1886, grant a valid discharge of the sums paid to the pupil children; and (2) that the minor children could themselves grant a valid discharge, and that the sums paid to them being of the nature of alimentary payments, and not capital sums for investment, it was not necessary, to secure against the risk of future challenge, to have a curator appointed to concur with them in the discharge. Jack, &c., v. North British Railway Co., Dec. 17, 1886, p. 263.

MINOR AND PUPIL—Continued.

Heritable bond by tutor.

2. A bond granted by a tutor over his ward's estate is null. Scott's Trustees v. Scott, July 19, 1887, p. 1043.

MORA. Poor—Assessment—Classification.

1. In 1846 a parochial board, with the approval of the Board of Supervision, adopted a classification of lands and heritages for occupants' rates into "(1) lands let for farming, (2) houses let as dwelling-houses and shops," the former being assessed at one-sixth of their full value, the latter at their full value. At that date there were no railways in the parish, but a railway was constructed in 1850. It was assessed in Class II., and continued to be so assessed without objection until 1886. Held in a declarator at the instance of the railway company against the parochial board that the pursuers were not barred by mora and acquiescence from having it declared that the classification was invalid in respect it was not exhaustive. North British Railway Co. v. Cardross Parochial Board, Feb. 17, 1887, p. 478.

Parent and child—Illegitimate child—Aliment.

2. In 1863 a woman was delivered of an illegitimate child in her father's house. The putative father admitted the paternity, and until the child was four years old made contributions in name of aliment to its maternal grandfather, with whom it continued to live. He then made an offer to take the child to his own house, which both its mother and its maternal grandfather declined. Thereafter the father contributed little or nothing towards the child's support. It continued to live with its grandfather till its seventeenth year, when it went to its mother. The maternal grandfather died in 1883, without having made any demand on the father in respect of the child's aliment. In 1886 the mother raised an action for payment of a sum in name of inlying expenses and of aliment down to the child's thirteenth year. Held that in the circumstances the pursuer was not entitled to recover, and defender assolized. Westlands v. Pirie, June 1, 1887, p. 763.

Transaction between trustees and beneficiaries.

3. Action raised in 1886 for reduction of a deed dated in 1852, under which the trust-estate had been conveyed by the beneficiaries to the trustees, as was averred, without adequate consideration, held not to have been timeously raised. Buckner v. Jopp's Trustees, July 16, 1887, p. 1006.

NOBILE OFFICIUM. See Burgh, 1, 8—Process, 17—Trust, 4, 5, 14, 15.

NUISANCE. Dean of Guild—Jurisdiction.

1. The Dean of Guild having refused to sanction the erection within burgh of a byre for the accommodation of twelve cows on the ground that it was likely to create a nuisance, on appeal the Court, doubting the Dean of Guild's jurisdiction to entertain the question of nuisance, sisted the process to enable the objectors to bring an interdict against the erection of the building in question. This having been done, after proof the interdict was refused, and in respect thereof the Dean of Guild's interlocutor in the other process was recalled, and a remit made to him to proceed with the lining. Manson v. Forrest, June 14, 1887, p. 802.
2. The surveyor of a burgh objected to warrant being granted by the Dean of Guild Court for the increase of certain stabling accommodation belonging to a carriage-hirer, on the ground that the buildings proposed to be enlarged were in the middle of a square of buildings densely populated, and that the smell and noise from them would constitute a nuisance, and that the danger of fire in the district would be increased by them. The Dean of Guild having allowed a proof as to these objections, the petitioner appealed, and maintained that they related only to the use of the proposed building and to alleged nuisance, which were beyond the jurisdiction of the Dean of Guild. The Court (diss. Lord Rutherford Clark) refused the appeal on the ground that it was expedient that the facts should be ascertained before determining whether the questions raised by the objections fell within the jurisdiction of the Dean of Guild. Robertson v. Thomas, June 17, 1887, p. 822.

NUISANCE—Continued.

Restriction in feu-contract.

3. Opinions as to the effect of a stipulation in a feu-contract against the erection upon the feu of any house "for the carrying on any trade or manufacture which may operate as a nuisance to the neighbouring feuars." Manson v. Forrest, June 14, 1887, p. 802.

Erection of byre in burgh.

4. Held that the business of cowkeeping may be so conducted and regulated within burgh as not to be a nuisance.

Circumstances in which the Court refused to grant interdict against the erection of a byre for twelve cows within burgh—the cowkeeper having come under an undertaking to regulate his business so as in the view of the Court to obviate the possibility of its creating a nuisance to the neighbouring proprietors. Manson v. Forrest, June 14, 1887, p. 802.

Property—Implied contract—Acquiescence.

5. The proprietor of an estate adjoining a town, part of which was built on land feued from him, constructed sewers so as to carry to his lands, for the purpose of irrigation, the sewage of that part of the town, and he made settling-ponds and other works on his estate for that purpose. In 1868 the Commissioners of Police of the town, which had adopted the General Police Act of 1862, executed drainage works, in doing which they took advantage of the proprietor's system of drainage, with his knowledge, connecting some of their drains with his sewers and settling-ponds. Thereafter the town increased, and the quantity of sewage drained towards the proprietor's lands was thus greatly augmented. The sewage irrigation became unsatisfactory, and was abandoned. In 1886 the proprietor, in consequence of the nuisance caused by the quantity of sewage sent upon his lands, raised an action against the Commissioners, concluding for declarator that the town was not entitled to send sewage upon the pursuer's lands, and for interdict. Held (1) that no contract by which the proprietor was bound to receive the town sewage upon his lands could be implied from the actings of parties; and (2) that he could not, by having allowed the drainage system of the town to be made so as to join his own without objection, be held to have acquiesced in their sending sewage upon his lands in time coming, and therefore that he was entitled to decree of declarator and interdict as craved. Houldsworth v. Burgh of Wishaw, July 14, 1887, p. 920.

PARENT AND CHILD. Pater est quem nuptiæ demonstrant.

1. The presumption pater est quem nuptiæ demonstrant may be rebutted by evidence which satisfies the Court that the husband was not the father.

Circumstances in which the Court held that the presumption was rebutted, although the husband and wife at the time of the child's conception resided in the same village. Steedman v. Steedman, July 20, 1887, p. 1066.

Illegitimate child—Aliment.

2. Held (diss. Lord Young) that a bastard son is liable to support his mother. Samson v. Davie, Nov. 26, 1886, p. 113.

PARENT AND CHILD—Continued.Illegitimate child—Aliment—Mora—Offer by father to take child.

3. In 1863 a woman was delivered of an illegitimate child in her father's house. The putative father admitted the paternity, and until the child was four years old made contributions in name of aliment to its maternal grandfather, with whom it continued to live. He then made an offer to take the child to his own house, which both its mother and its maternal grandfather declined. Thereafter the father contributed little or nothing towards the child's support. It continued to live with its grandfather till its seventeenth year, when it went to its mother. She had previously contributed nothing directly to its support, although she was in the habit of residing with her father for considerable periods, when she was not in domestic service. The maternal grandfather died in 1883, without having made any demand on the father in respect of the child's aliment. In 1886 the mother raised an action for payment of a sum in name of inlying expenses and of aliment down to the child's thirteenth year. Held (dub. Lord Rutherford Clark, rev. judgment of Lord M'Laren) that in the circumstances the pursuer was not entitled to recover, and defender assolized. Westlands v. Pirie, June 1, 1887, p. 763.

Illegitimate child—Custody.

4. The mother of an illegitimate child agreed to hand over the child, then eight months old, to the custody of the father for maintenance and education. Nine months thereafter she presented a petition to the Court praying for the custody of the child. The father opposed the petition on the ground that she had bound herself by the agreement to allow him to have the custody of the child. Held that the mother was not bound by the agreement, but was entitled to the order craved.

Opinions that the mother of an illegitimate child cannot by agreement deprive herself of the right to its custody. Macpherson v. Leishman, June 4, 1887, p. 780.

PARTNERSHIP. Joint adventure—Constitution of contract.

1. Correspondence which was held (rev. judgment of Lord Lee) not to constitute a contract of joint adventure, in respect it contained no termini habiles for determining the duration of the contract or its essential conditions. Young v. Dougans, Feb. 23, 1887, p. 490.

Joint adventure—Ish of contract.

2. Opinions (per Lord Justice-Clerk and Lord Craighill) that a contract of joint adventure, unless there be something special in its nature, is terminable at the will of either party, if that be exercised in good faith and at a seasonable time. Young v. Dougans, Feb. 23, 1887, p. 490.

Process—Summons—Defenders.

3. An action was brought against a descriptive firm and the individual partners thereof, "as such partners and as individuals," concluding against the defenders, "jointly and severally," for a lump sum of £1000 in name of damages for judicial slander. The condescendence contained no averments of individual fault against any of the partners. Held (rev. judgment of Lord M'Laren) that the action was an action against the firm only. Gordon v. British and Foreign Metaline Co., &c., Nov. 16, 1886, p. 75.

Reparation—Slander.

4. A company or private partnership may be sued for damages for judicial slander, notwithstanding that malice must be proved against the defenders. Gordon v. British and Foreign Metaline Co., &c., Nov. 16, 1886, p. 75.
See Company, 3.

PATENT. Procedure—Interdict.

1. A, the holder of a patent, obtained interim interdict against B to prevent infringement. B did not object to the validity of the patent, but immediately thereafter assumed his son, C, as a partner with a view to manufacturing articles which A alleged were in infringement of his patent. A thereupon presented a petition and complaint against B and C for breach of interdict. B and C averred that the articles manufactured by them did not constitute an infringement, and further, C challenged the validity of A's patent. Held (in conformity with Dudgeon v. Thomson and Donaldson, 3 R. 604 and 974, and 4 R. (H. L.) 88), (1) that it was competent to bring C into the process, though the interdict was not directed against him personally, and (2) that C was not entitled to a proof of his averments regarding the validity of the patent. Harvie v. W. & T. Ross, Nov. 13, 1886, p. 71.

PATENT—Continued.

Damages—Infringement of subsidiary part of patented mechanism.

2. Where articles are manufactured by means of pirated machinery, it is relevant for the patentees to aver as grounds of damage that they have suffered from loss of market, and obtained smaller prices for the patented goods, owing to the competition of the infringers.

In an action of damages brought by a company engaged in the manufacture of horse-shoe nails against another company engaged in the same manufacture for damages caused by the defenders' infringement of patents belonging to the pursuers for improvements in the mechanism used in the manufacture, the defenders admitted that certain boxes of nails, manufactured and sold by them, had been made by means of machines which, in a previous action, had been held to be in certain minute particulars infringements of the pursuers' patents; but they proved that the pirated portions of the mechanism were not essential to the manufacture of the nails, and that without using these portions they could have made the nails as well, and almost, if not quite, as cheaply, as with them. Held that inasmuch as infringement of patented right was admitted, it must be assumed that the pirated mechanism was of some utility, although it was proved to be but small, and that the amount of damages fell to be assessed on the footing that the infringer must pay merely for the benefit which he had taken from the use of the improvements pirated. Damages assessed at £50. United Horse Shoe and Nail Co., Limited, v. Stewart & Co., Dec. 17, 1886, p. 266.

See Copyright, 2.

PERSONAL OR REAL. Whether legacy made real burden on heritage generally conveyed by settlement—Titles to Land Consolidation Act, 1868 (31 and 32 Vict. cap. 101), sec. 19, schedule L.

In a general settlement the testator conveyed to his son his whole means and estate, heritable and moveable, "but declaring that the above conveyance is granted with and under the following provisions, burdens, limitations, and declarations, viz."—(Here followed obligations on the disponent to pay certain annuities and legacies)—"declaring that the said provisions . . . shall form real burdens over the heritable estate hereby conveyed." The title of the disponent was completed by a notarial instrument (in terms of schedule L, sec. 19, of The Titles to Land Consolidation Act, 1868), which, after setting forth the conveyance in the general disposition, bore, "but always under the provisions, burdens, limitations, and declarations mentioned in said general disposition and deed of settlement." A legatee having failed to obtain payment of his legacy from the disponent, who had become bankrupt, brought an action of damages against the agent who had been employed by the deceased and by the disponent, alleging that he had been guilty of a breach of professional duty in not constituting the legacy a real burden when making up the disponent's title to the heritage. Held that the general conveyance did not create a real burden, and that there was no obligation upon the disponent or his agent to create one, and action dismissed.

Opinion (per the Lord President) that neither a general disposition without a description of the lands conveyed, nor a notarial instrument following thereon in terms of schedule L of the Titles to Land Consolidation Act, 1868, can create a real burden on the lands. Williamson v. Begg, May 18, 1887, p. 720.

POLICE. Guild offence—Alterations "affecting the exterior dimensions" of a building—Glasgow Police Act, 1866 (29 and 30 Vict. cap. cclxxiii.), sec. 364 and 365.

1. Held that the insertion of a window 5 feet by 3, which did not project beyond the plane of the wall, in each of two gables of a building was not an alteration requiring the authority of the Dean of Guild as affecting the exterior dimensions of the building in the sense of the above Act. Gourlay v. Lang, June 4, 1887, Just. Cases, p. 31.

Free space for air—Glasgow Police Act, 1866 (29 and 30 Vict. cap. cclxxiii.), sec. 370.

2. Plans of buildings proposed to be erected in Glasgow which were held not to comply with the provisions of the 370th section of the Glasgow Police Act, 1866, requiring a certain amount of free space in front of the windows of sleeping apartments. Glass v. Glasgow Master of Works, March 5, 1887, p. 567.

Sale of superfluous lands by Police Commissioners.

3. Authority granted to Police Commissioners to sell lands for which they had no use, but which they had not statutory authority to dispose of. Linthgow Police Commissioners, Feb. 2, 1887, p. 444.

POOR. Relief—Poor-Law Act, 1845 (8 and 9 Vict. c. 83), sec. 70.

1. An Irishman having no settlement in Scotland, being found destitute in the parish of Ardchattan, was sent to the combination poorhouse for the parishes of Ardchattan, Kilmore, and others, at Oban, in the parish of Kilmore. After remaining some months in the house the pauper applied to the governor for leave of absence for a night to attend a wedding, and asked for his own clothes to go in. The governor told him that he could not give him leave of absence for a night, but in the belief that he wished to leave the poorhouse finally, gave him his clothes. The pauper then left the house, but returned the same afternoon. The governor refused to admit him without an order. Next morning the pauper applied to the inspector of Kilmore, who gave him an order form, with blanks to be filled up by the medical officer and by the inspector, and sent him to the medical officer. After seeing the medical officer, who filled up the blanks requiring to be filled up by him, the pauper returned to the poorhouse and was admitted, the inspector not having filled in any blanks. The governor made no new entry in the admission-book. Held that the pauper had not ceased to be an inmate of the poorhouse chargeable to the parish of Ardchattan, and had not become chargeable to Kilmore. McCaig v. Sinclair, March 4, 1887, p. 539.

Assessment—Valuation-roll—Review by Court of Session—Poor-Law (Scotland) Amendment Act, 1845 (8 and 9 Vict. c. 83), sec. 37.

2. A parochial board assessed for poor-rates the owner and occupier of water-works on the annual value of the subjects appearing in the Valuation-roll without allowing deduction of the average cost of repairs, insurance, &c., in terms of the 37th section of the Poor-Law Act, 1845, on the ground that the assessor in preparing the Valuation-roll had already made these deductions. In a suspension held (1) that for the purposes of assessment under the Poor-Law Act, 1845, the Valuation-roll as completed in terms of the Valuation of Lands (Scotland) Act, 1854, was conclusive as to the yearly rent or value of lands and heritages entered therein, and that the Court of Session had no jurisdiction to review the process by which the entry there made was reached, and (2) that before assessment the suspender was entitled to have the above deductions made from the sum entered in the Valuation-roll. Magistrates of Glasgow v. Hall, Jan. 14, 1887, p. 319.

Assessment—Classification—Railway—Poor-Law Amendment Act, 1845 (8 and 9 Vict. cap. 83), sec. 36.

3. A classification of lands and heritages for occupants' rates, under section 36 of the Poor-Law Amendment Act, 1845, in order to be legal, must be exhaustive.

POOR—Continued.

In 1846 a parochial board, with the approval of the Board of Supervision, adopted a classification of lands and heritages for occupants' rates into "(1) lands let for farming, (2) houses let as dwelling-houses and shops," the former being assessed at one-sixth of their value, the latter at their full value. At that date there were no railways in the parish, but a railway was constructed in 1850. It was assessed in Class II. at its full value, and continued to be so assessed without objection until 1886. Held, in a declarator at the instance of the railway company against the parochial board, (1) that while the Court had no jurisdiction to set aside a classification on the ground that it was inequitable, or to order a parochial board to adopt a new classification, it had jurisdiction to declare a classification to be invalid on the ground that it was not exhaustive of the lands and heritages in the parish; (2) that the classification in question was invalid on that ground, in respect that it did not, according to the ordinary meaning of its language, provide a place for railways, and was not shewn to have been approved by the Board of Supervision as implying anything else than its ordinary meaning; (3) that the pursuers were not barred by mora and acquiescence from having it declared that the classification was an invalid classification; and (4) that until a legal and valid classification had been adopted and approved, they were entitled to interdict against the parochial board levying from them as occupants higher rates than were imposed on any other occupant of lands and heritages in the parish. North British Railway Co. v. Cardross Parochial Board, Feb. 17, 1887, p. 478.

PRESCRIPTION. Entail—Limited and unlimited title—Consolidation.

1. An entail, dated in 1715, comprised, inter alia, certain lands the dominium utile of which had been disposed by the entailer or his predecessors prior to the date of the entail, so that the entail only carried the superiority thereof. The dominium utile was acquired in 1721 by the next succeeding heir of entail, who took a disposition in favour of himself and his heirs and assignees whomsoever, being a different destination from that contained in the entail. He was not infeft either under the entail or under the disposition. In 1765 the next heir was infeft upon the unexecuted precept in the conveyance of 1721, having previously served heir in general to the last heir. The next heir in 1780 made up a title under the entail, but no separate title to the said lands, which he possessed along with the entailed estate down to 1843, when he died. Held that consolidation had not operated so as to bring the dominium utile of the said lands within the entail, and that a subsequent heir was therefore proprietor thereof in fee-simple. Earl of Glasgow v. Boyle, Jan. 28, 1887, p. 419.

Foreshore—Prescriptive possession.

2. A proprietor, with titles dating from 1804, flowing from a subject-superior, which described his property as "bounded on the south by the sea," brought a declarator of property in the seashore ex adverso of his lands against the Crown. As he could not recover his immediate superior's titles, he founded on his own possession on his own titles. He proved that one of his predecessors under the subject-superior had built a retaining wall whereby a considerable portion of the foreshore was reclaimed, that he and they had for more than the prescriptive period been in use to cart drift sea-ware (no ware grew on the shore) in large quantities from the shore for manure, that they had occasionally taken stones or gravel from the shore for various purposes, and that they had built and used a private bathing-house on the shore. The Crown in defence proved that a large quantity of stones had been taken (by fishermen in their boats) from that part of the coast to build a public break-water, but it was not shewn that any considerable quantity had been taken from the part of the foreshore claimed by the pursuer, or that he or his authors knew what was being done. The Crown further proved that members of the public had taken sea-ware from the foreshore claimed by the pursuer, in creels or in barrows (but they never did so in carts, having only a right of access by foot to that part of the shore); and that they had also taken whelks, mussels, and other shellfish, and shot gulls on the foreshore.

PRESCRIPTION—Continued.

Held (aff. judgment of Second Division) that the pursuer had established a case of prescriptive possession, and was entitled to decree of declarator accordingly. Young v. North British Railway Co. and the Lord Advocate, August 1, 1887, H. L., p. 53.

Arrestments—Forthcoming—Act 1669, cap. 9—Personal Diligence Act, 1838 (1 and 2 Vict. c. 114), sec. 22.

3. A creditor arrested upon a decree a fund vested in his debtor, but not payable till the death of an annuitant. Within three years of the date of the arrestments the debtor applied for and obtained decree of cessio. The arrester appeared to oppose the application, but did not found on his arrestments. Held that on the lapse of the three years, the arrestments prescribed, as they had not been "pursued or insisted on" in the sense of the Act 1669, cap. 9.

Observed, that though the arrested fund was not payable till the death of the annuitant, it would have been competent for the arrester to interrupt the course of prescription by raising an action of forthcoming, concluding for payment upon that event. Jameson v. Sharp, March 18, 1887, p. 643.

See Bill of Exchange, 1—Road, 1, 2.

PRESUMPTION. Presumption of Life Limitation (Scotland) Act, 1881 (44 and 45 Vict. cap. 47), secs. 5 and 8.

1. Held that to exclude the presumption of death under the above Act on the day completing the seven years, the presumption arising from the facts must be such as would have been sufficient to overcome the presumption of life at common law. Williamson v. Williamson, &c., Dec. 10, 1886, p. 226.

Pater est quem nuptiæ demonstrant.

2. The presumption pater est quem nuptiæ demonstrant may be rebutted by evidence which satisfies the Court that the husband was not the father.

Circumstances in which the Court held that the presumption was rebutted although the husband and wife at the time of the child's conception resided in the same village. Steedman v. Steedman, July 20, 1887, p. 1067.

Presumption against child-bearing.

3. Anticipation of period of payment by trustees. Urquhart's Trustees v. Urquhart, Nov. 23, 1886, p. 112.

PROCESS. Summons—Defenders—Partnership.

1. An action was brought against a descriptive firm and the individual partners thereof, "as such partners and as individuals," concluding against the defenders, "jointly and severally," for a lump sum of £1000 in name of damages for judicial slander. The condescendence contained no averments of individual fault against any of the partners. Held (rev. judgment of Lord McLaren) that the action was an action against the firm only. Gordon v. British and Foreign Metaline Co., &c., Nov. 16, 1886, p. 75.

2. A company or a private partnership may be sued for damages for judicial slander, notwithstanding that malice must be proved against the defenders. Gordon v. British and Foreign Metaline Co., &c., Nov. 16, 1886, p. 75.

Summons—Relevancy—Malice.

3. Necessity for specific averments of malice in actions of damages for slander or wrongful apprehension. See Reparation, 22, 23, 24, 32.

Revisal of Pleadings—Court of Session Act, 1868 (31 and 32 Vict. c. 100), sec. 25.

4. Where defences include a separate statement of facts, and an order for revisal of the condescendence and defences, in terms of sec. 25 of the Court of Session Act, 1868, is pronounced, the pursuers ought to lodge specific answers to the defenders' revised statement of facts. Reid v. Reid's Trustees, June 2, 1887, p. 770.

PROCESS—Continued.Reclaiming Note—Bankruptcy—Sequestration.

5. Held that the Court of Session Act, 1868, did not apply to proceedings under the Bankruptcy Acts, and that a reclaiming note against an interlocutor of the Lord Ordinary on the Bills in an appeal against a resolution of creditors in a sequestration under the 169th section of the Bankruptcy Act, 1856, was competently brought within fourteen days, and without leave of the Lord Ordinary. M'George v. M'George's Creditors, June 25, 1887, p. 841.

Reponing—Expenses—Husband and Wife.

6. The condition imposed by 48 Geo. III. cap. 151, sec. 16, does not apply to a wife seeking to be reponed in an action between her and her husband. Steedman v. Steedman, March 19, 1887, p. 682.

Amendment of interlocutor.

7. A note having been presented to have an interlocutor which had been erroneously framed varied, held that, as the party aggrieved could not in the particular case appeal to the House of Lords, the only remedy was for the Court to amend the interlocutor. Ferguson Bequest Fund v. Commissioners on Educational Endowments, May 17, 1887, p. 717.

Proof—Recalling witness—Evidence Act, 1852 (15 and 16 Vict. c. 27), secs. 3, 4.

8. Opinions that it is incompetent to recall a witness to be examined as to statements alleged to have been made by him since he was examined as a witness in contradiction of the evidence he then gave. Begg v. Begg, Feb. 25, 1887, p. 497.

Proof or jury trial—Declarator of right of way.

9. An action of declarator of a public right of way appointed to be tried by a Lord Ordinary without a jury, in respect that the alleged right of way, which was in Forfarshire, had been the subject of correspondence in the Scotsman newspaper, and of a report submitted by the Scottish Rights of Way and Recreation Society to its members. Scottish Rights of Way and Recreation Society v. Macpherson, Oct. 23, 1886, p. 7.

Jury trial—Slander—Provinces of Judge and of jury.

10. A person charged with having contravened the Weights and Measures Act, 1878, by having in his possession or using measures which were not of any Board of Trade standard, and were false or unjust, was convicted of the offence except in so far as it was charged that his measures were false or unjust. He afterwards brought an action of damages against the printer and publisher of a newspaper for slander contained in an article commenting on the case, which, upon the face of it, assumed that there had been a conviction upon both charges. There was no issue of justification, and the defender in his defences offered a retraction and apology, and a nominal sum of damages, and in the witness-box admitted that the article charged the pursuer with dishonest conduct. The presiding Judge (Lord M'Laren) told the jury that it was for them to consider whether the article was false and calumnious, and no exception was taken to his charge. The jury having returned a verdict for the defender, the Court granted a new trial upon the ground that the verdict was contrary to evidence—dis. Lord M'Laren, who held that it being the province of the jury and not of the Court to determine whether the article was or was not a defamatory libel, their verdict affirming that it did not exceed the limits of fair criticism ought not to be interfered with. Ross v. M'Kittrick, Dec. 17, 1886, p. 255.

Judicial sale—Storage of goods pending litigation.

11. Where a trustee on a sequestrated estate incurred expense in storing goods till it should be ascertained whether they belonged to the bankrupt estate, held, on its being found that they did not belong to it, that the owner was not bound to repay to the trustee the cost of storage, as the latter should have applied for a warrant to sell them. Wilson's Trustee v. Fraser's Trustee, March 1, 1887, p. 504.

PROCESS—Continued.Reduction—Partial reduction—Fou-contract.

12. Partial reduction of a feu-contract on the ground of error. Glasgow Feuing and Building Co., Limited, v. Watson's Trustees, March 11, 1887, p. 610.

Reduction—Partial reduction—Exxcambion of glebe and churchyard.

13. The minister of a parish, with consent of the Presbytery, excambied the site of the church, the churchyard, and part of the glebe, for other lands belonging to a heritor in the parish. In an action of reduction by the minister and the kirk-session for reduction of the deed as being null without consent of the heritors, held (1) that in so far as regarded the site of the church and the churchyard, the deed was invalid; (2) that quoad ultra the deed was valid—the pursuer and his successors in the benefice not being prejudiced by its partial reduction, or by the failure of the transaction with regard to the site of the church and the churchyard. Bain v. Lady Seafield, July 15, 1887, p. 939.

Reduction—Debts recovery decree.

14. Reduction of a decree under the Debts Recovery Act, 1867 (30 and 31 Vict. cap. 96), held to be incompetent. Robertson v. Pringle, Feb. 3, 1887, p. 474.

Petition—Judicial Factor—Recall—Junior Lord Ordinary—Distribution of Business Act, 1857 (20 and 21 Vict. cap. 56), sec. 6.

15. Held (following Kyle, 24 D. 1083) that the appointment of a curator bonis made by the Junior Lord Ordinary may competently be recalled by him. Tweedie, Dec. 8, 1886, p. 212.
16. Held by Lord Trayner (Ordinary) that a petition for recall of the appointment of a judicial factor may be competently presented to the Junior Lord Ordinary. Masterton v. Erskine's Trustees, May 14, 1887, p. 712.

Petition—Jurisdiction of Inner-House.

17. A petition by beneficiaries under a trust-deed for advances out of the trust-funds rested alternatively upon the nobile officium of the Court and the provisions of the Trusts Act, 1867, is competently presented in the Inner-House. Websters v. Miller's Trustees, Feb. 26, 1887, p. 501.

Petition—Intimation—Companies Act, 1862 (25 and 26 Vict. cap. 89), sec. 100.

18. The liquidator of a company applied for an order under the 100th section of the Companies Act, 1862, on a former agent of the company, who was resident in Canada, to deliver up books and papers in his possession belonging to the company, and moved the Court to pronounce the order without intimation. The Court refused the motion, and ordered intimation. British Canadian Lumbering and Timber Co., Limited, Dec. 3, 1886, p. 160.

Appeal—Dispensation from printing in hoc statu—Boxing of prints.

19. The provisions of sec. 3, subsec. 2, of the A. S., 10th March 1870, relating to the lodging of manuscript copies or prints in appeals from the Sheriff Court, do not apply to cases where an interlocutor has been pronounced dispensing with printing in hoc statu; and should the Court subsequently refuse to dispense with printing, a day will then be fixed for the boxing of the necessary prints. Ross v. Gray, June 2, 1887, p. 768.

Appeal—Interlocutor—Findings in fact.

20. A possessory judgment granting interdict was pronounced by a Sheriff after a proof. Pending an appeal against this judgment the defender raised a declarator of property, in which he was ultimately unsuccessful. The pursuer having stated that in the event of an appeal to the House of Lords his case might be prejudiced by findings of fact in the interdict process, the Court pronounced an interlocutor dismissing the appeal in respect of the judgment in the declarator. Keiller v. Magistrates of Dundee, Dec. 7, 1886, p. 191.

21. In a petition in a Sheriff Court by a professor for interdict to prevent the defender publishing a book alleged to be in substance a reproduction of the pursuer's lectures, the case, on appeal to the Second Division, was referred to the whole Court, with the result that nine Judges were of the opinion that the book was in substance a reproduction of the lectures, three were of opinion that it was not, while the remaining Judge reserved his opinion on this point. On the question as to whether the pursuer, being a university professor, was entitled to the protection of an interdict, six Judges were of the opinion that he was, five that he was not, while the two remaining Judges gave no judgment on the question, holding that the book was not a reproduction of the lectures. The Second Division of the Court, before whom the appeal depended, thereupon pronounced judgment, finding that the lectures referred to on record were delivered by the pursuer as part of his course, and that the book complained of was published by the defender, having been compiled by a student who had attended the lectures and taken notes in shorthand; they then found, "in conformity with the opinions of the majority of the whole Court, that such publication did not constitute an infringement of any legal right of property belonging to or otherwise vested in the pursuer," and refused the interdict. In an appeal, held that, in compliance with the 40th section of the Judicature Act, 1850, the Court ought to have inserted in the interlocutor a finding in fact, in conformity with the opinions of the majority of the Judges, that the book in question was a reproduction of the lectures, and that the case fell to be dealt with as if such finding had been inserted. Caird v. Sime, June 13, 1887, H. L., p. 37.

PROCESS—Continued.

Appeal from Sheriff Court in sequestrations. See Bankruptcy, 5, 6, 7, 8.

Procedure for enforcement of foreign decrees. See Foreign, 3.

Procedure in Interdicts. See Interdict, 2.

PROOF. Parole—Guarantee by commission agent of minimum price.

1. Question, whether, in an action of accounting between a principal and a commission agent, it was competent to prove by parole that the agent, in order to retain his principal's custom, had agreed in a particular transaction to pay a minimum sum as the price of the goods to be sold, whether that sum should be realised on sale or not. Opinions per Lord Justice-Clerk and Lord Young that it was not; per Lord Craighill and Lord Rutherford Clark contra. Reid v. Reid Brothers, June 8, 1887, p. 789.

Testament—Extrinsic evidence.

2. In the construction of a will and codicils, the Court is entitled to have regard to the state of the testator's circumstances at the dates when they were written, but not to indications of intention appearing in jottings or memoranda by him. Trustees of the Free Church of Scotland v. Maitland, &c., Jan. 14, 1887, p. 333.

Customs prosecution—Evidence of accused—Customs Consolidation Act, 1876 (39 and 40 Vict. c. 36), secs. 179, 259.

3. Certain foreigners were convicted and sentenced before a Justice of Peace Court, upon a complaint under the 179th section of the Customs Consolidation Act, 1876, charging them with having on board a foreign ship, within one league of the British coast, packages of spirits, tobacco, &c., of a size and character which are prohibited to be imported. In an appeal against the conviction, held that the Judge in the inferior Court had rightly declined to admit the evidence of the accused, section 259 of the Customs Law Consolidation Act, 1876, which admits such evidence in certain circumstances, not being applicable to the case.

Held further, that it was not a good objection to the conviction that the evidence had not been recorded by the Judge in the inferior Court, the accused not having asked him to do so. Dodsworth v. Rijnbergen, Dec. 15, 1886, p. 238.

Husband and Wife—Evidence of wife of accused in public-house prosecution.

4. A public-house keeper, convicted of a breach of his certificate, appealed on the ground, inter alia, that he had tendered his wife as a witness, and her evidence had been rejected by the magistrates as incompetent. The Court, without deciding that the evidence of the wife of the accused in a public-house prosecution was in all circumstances incompetent, refused the appeal. Morrison v. Morrison, June 3, 1887, Just. Cases, p. 28.

PROPERTY. Golfing Links—Servitude—Possessory judgment.

1. In 1799 the Magistrates of St Andrews granted a feu-disposition of a large part of the Pilmour Links, belonging to the burgh, "reserving the bleaching ground, as particularly marked out by march-stones placed therein, on which the inhabitants of St Andrews are to have the liberty and privilege of bleaching in all time coming"; and also, inter alia, "under the reservation always that no hurt or damage shall be done thereby to the golf links, nor shall it be in the power of any proprietor of said Pilmour Links to plough up any part of said golf links in all time coming, but the same shall be reserved entirely, as it has been in times past, for the comfort and amusement of the inhabitants and others who shall resort thither for that amusement." In 1881 the successor of the original donee, with consent of his grazing tenant, let a portion of the ground to the St Andrews Ladies' Golf Club for seven years from Martinmas 1880, at a rent of £4 per annum, payable to the grazing tenant. The lease excepted "from said piece of ground hereby let any portion thereof over which the inhabitants of St Andrews may be entitled to exercise the liberty and privilege of bleaching" under the feu-disposition, and declared that "the piece of ground hereby let is to be made use of for the purpose of golfing or putting by the members of St Andrews Ladies' Golf Club, and by such other persons as the said club may allow, but by no others," the pasturage being reserved to the grazing tenant. The club had from 1867 had possession of the same piece of ground under a missive offer of lease with similar conditions. In 1885 the club brought an action in the Sheriff Court to have an inhabitant of St Andrews, who was not a member of the club, interdicted from golfing on the ground let to them. The defences were (1) that the lease was ultra vires of the granter, in respect that the right of golfing reserved in the original feu-disposition extended over the whole Links, or at all events over the ground said to have been let to the pursuers; (2) that the lease expressly excluded the bleaching ground, and that the bleaching ground included the whole or a part of the ground claimed by the pursuers; (3) that the pursuers had not proved exclusive possession. It was, in the opinion of a majority of the Court, proved in point of fact that the public golf course was defined and marked out by march-stones, that the ground in dispute formed no part of that course, and that since 1880 the pursuers had had exclusive possession of that ground under a lease granted by the proprietor thereof, and for thirteen years previously under a missive of lease with him. Held (diss. Lord Young) that the pursuers were entitled to a possessory judgment. St Andrews Ladies' Golf Club v. Denham, May 13, 1887, p. 686.

Conveyance of front area to lower proprietor in tenement—Right of upper proprietor.

2. The proprietor of a dwelling-house with an area fronting the street disposed the two upper stories and attics of the house, with a declaration that the donee should have no right to the area. Subsequently the proprietor of the lower floors and area built over the area to the height of his part of the house. The proprietor of the upper floors having proposed to erect a new building and rest it upon this addition, held that he was not entitled to do so. Question, whether he was entitled to extend his house over the area provided he did not rest upon the lower proprietor's extension. Arrol v. Inches, &c., Jan. 27, 1887, p. 394.

See Nuisance, 5—River, &c.

PUBLIC-HOUSE. Hotel certificate—Bona fide traveller.

1. Circumstances which were held sufficient to justify a hotel-keeper in regarding certain persons to whom he sold refreshments on a Sunday as bona fide travellers. Dickson v. Linton, Nov. 19, 1886, Just. Cases, p. 13.

Breach of public-house certificate—"Giving out" alone charged.

2. A public-house keeper was charged with an offence against the Public-Houses Acts, in so far as at a time and place libelled he did "give out" a certain quantity of whisky in breach of his certificate. He was convicted "of the offence charged," and appealed on a case stated, pleading, inter alia, that the complaint was irrelevant, in respect that "giving out" by itself did not necessarily import a breach of the certificate. The Court, being of opinion that on the facts stated in the case the appellant had committed a breach of his certificate, refused the appeal. Morrison v. Morrison, June 3, 1887, Just. Cases, p. 28.

PUBLIC-HOUSE—Continued.

Penalty—Modification.

3. In a prosecution for an offence against the Public Houses Acts brought under the Edinburgh Police Act, 1879, and not under the Summary Jurisdiction Acts, 1864 and 1881, the magistrate may competently exercise the power conferred by the Summary Jurisdiction Act, 1881, sec. 6, subsec. A, to impose a modified penalty. Linton v. Sherry, June 4, 1887, Just. Cases, p. 46.

Proof—Husband and Wife.

4. Competency of evidence of wife of accused in a public-house prosecution. Morrison v. Morrison, June 3, 1887, Just. Cases, p. 28.

PUBLIC RECORDS. Mistake in recorded deed.

Held that where a feu-contract was not intended to impose an obligation to make certain roads on the superior, and where a company in purchasing from the vassal did not stipulate for and did not understand that they were getting such an obligation, the mere fact that such obligation erroneously appeared in the feu-contract and in the record did not entitle the company, though bona fide purchasers for value, to object to the Court rectifying the feu-contract and the records.

Observed (per Lord Young) that one purchasing on the faith of the records is not entitled to rely on the validity or subsistence of such incidental obligations as an obligation to make roads although appearing on the records undischarged. Glasgow Feuing and Building Co., Limited, v. Watson's Trustees, March 11, 1887, p. 610.

RAILWAY. Mines and Minerals—Clay—Compulsory sale—Water-Works Clauses Act, 1847 (10 and 11 Vict. c. 17)—Railways Clauses Act, 1845 (8 and 9 Vict. c. 33).

1. Held (diss. Lord Mure, rev. judgment of Lord M'Laren) that the provision of the Water-Works Clauses Act, 1847, excluding from conveyances of lands purchased under the Act (when not expressly included) "mines of coal, ironstone, slate, or other minerals" applied to minerals of every kind which the seller might find it profitable to work, and therefore applied to ordinary clay having a commercial value. Magistrates of Glasgow v. Farie, Jan. 21, 1887, p. 346.

Bye-law—Travelling without proper ticket—Oppression.

2. A bye-law of a railway company provided that "any passenger using or attempting to use a ticket on any day for which such ticket is not available, or using a ticket which has been already used on a previous journey, is hereby subjected to a penalty not exceeding forty shillings." Held that the bye-law was only applicable to cases where an attempt was made to cheat the company, and that it was oppressive to prosecute for the penalty when there was no such attempt. Thom v. Caledonian Railway Co., Nov. 12, 1886, Just. Cases, p. 5.

See Contract, 3—Poor, 3—Reparation, 1, 6.

RECOMPENSE. See Bankruptcy, 9—Compensation.REPARATION. Consequential damages—Carrier—Conveyance of goods.

1. A manufacturer forwarded a bale of cloth by rail, consigned to a shipping agent at Grimsby, who was to ship it for Germany. On arrival at Grimsby the package was found to be frayed, and some slight damage done to the cloth. The shipping agent refused to take delivery, being of opinion that the goods could not be safely forwarded in their damaged package. The railway company thereupon returned them to the manufacturer, who repacked them, and forwarded them to Germany. On arrival there they were rejected as being too late. The manufacturer having sued the railway company for damages for loss of market, held that the shipping agent was entitled to refuse to take delivery, and that the loss of market was the direct result of the damage done to the package by the railway company, who were therefore liable for it. Keddie, Gordon, & Co. v. North British Railway Co., Dec. 15, 1886, p. 233.

REPARATION—Continued.

Consequential damages—Dangerous animal—Dog.

2. A porter brought an action against the occupier of a house at which he had been delivering coals, alleging that he had received injuries through the occupier's dog leaping upon another porter who was working along with the pursuer, and causing him to drop a piece of coal on the pursuer's foot; and further, that the dog was known by its owner to be of vicious and ferocious habits. Held that the action was relevant. Fraser v. Bell, June 14, 1887, p. 811.

Contributory negligence—Quarryman.

3. Held that an ordinary labourer in a quarry, who, along with a skilled quarryman appointed by the manager, was employed in extracting an unusually large unexploded blast charge, which was an operation of peculiar difficulty, danger, and rarity, and was injured by an explosion caused probably by the skilled workman having made use of a steel jumper instead of a copper needle, was not barred by contributory negligence from obtaining damages from his employer. Cook v. Stark, Oct. 15, 1886, p. 1.
4. An action of damages was raised against quarrymasters by the representatives of a workman killed while engaged at the quarry in tunnelling a bank of earth with a view to its removal. The work was thus carried on: Two chambers were cut about ten feet apart, and a tunnel was cut between them, supports being left for the roof on each side. The supports were then removed, and the soil allowed to fall in. This work was safe at first, but became dangerous as it approached completion. It was the practice, as a necessary precaution to prevent accident, to station a man on the top of the ground, as the work became dangerous, to warn the workmen below if any cracks shewed themselves, but it did not appear to be understood whether it was the duty of the foreman or of the workmen engaged in the work to see to this being done when it became necessary. When the accident happened the deceased was engaged in removing one of the supports, and no watcher had been stationed on the surface of the tunnel. Held that there was fault on the part of the employer in respect either that the foreman had not sent a man to watch the surface or made it clear to the workmen that that was their duty, and that there was no contributory negligence on the part of the deceased, who was entitled to rely on the precaution having been taken, and did not carelessly rush upon a seen danger. M'Inally v. King's Trustees, Oct. 27, 1886, p. 8.

Contributory negligence—Railway—Driver.

5. An engine-driver was killed by his head coming in contact with a bridge over the railway as he was leaning over the side of the engine to see if the brakes were working properly. It was averred, in an action of damages by his widow and children against the company, that the bridge was greatly narrower than any other in the kingdom, and was four inches narrower than was required by the Board of Trade in the case of new works. The bridge was upwards of thirty years old. There was no averment as to the length of time the driver had been in the service of the company, or as to his knowledge of the line. Held that there was no relevant averment of fault, and that the pursuers were not entitled to an issue. M'Ghie v. North British Railway Co., Feb. 26, 1887, p. 499.

Contributory negligence—Child.

6. Two children, aged three and five, who were crossing a crowded city street, unattended by any person in charge of them, were knocked down and injured by a passing vehicle. In an action by their father for reparation, it was proved that the driver was to blame. Held that it was not a good defence that the pursuer had contributed to the accident by allowing such young children to be in a place of danger without someone in charge of them. Martin v. Wards, June 15, 1887, p. 814.

REPARATION—Continued.

Contributory negligence—Tramway-car—Rule of road.

7. A passenger who had alighted from a tramway-car, and was crossing from the car to the pavement on the left, was knocked down by a van going in the same direction as the car, and passing it on the left-hand side. In an action of damages brought against the van owners for injuries thereby received, the Court assuizied the defenders, holding that fault had not been proved on the part of the van-driver, while there had been carelessness on the part of the pursuer in not looking to his own safety.

Observed (per the Lord President) that the rule of the road requires that a tramway-car shall be passed by a following vehicle on the left-hand side. Jardine v. Stonefield Laundry Co., June 24, 1887, p. 839.

Dangerous animal—Dog.

8. Held that the owner of a dog which he knew to be vicious, and which he allowed to go unrestrained through his garden, was liable in damages to a person who had permission to enter the garden, and had been injured there by the dog. Smillies v. Boyd, Dec. 2, 1886, p. 150.
9. A workman unnecessarily went within reach of a dog belonging to his employers, and known by them to be of a vicious disposition, which was chained to a kennel in the workyard. He was bitten by the dog. Held that he was not entitled to damages from his employers on account of the injury thereby sustained, the Court being of opinion that the injury was due solely to his own negligence. Daly v. Arrol Brothers, Dec. 2, 1886, p. 154.

See also 2, supra.

Master and Servant—Fellow-servant—Common object.

10. A grain-merchant employed a carting contractor to carry a quantity of grain from a ship to be stored with a storing agent. One of the bags of grain, while it was being hoisted into the store, fell upon the carter employed by the contractor and killed him. Its fall was due to the fault of a servant of the storekeeper. Held that the carter and the storekeeper's servant being engaged in common labour for a common object, the storekeeper was not liable to the carter's representatives for the consequences of his servant's fault. Congleton v. Angus, Jan. 12, 1887, p. 309.

Master and Servant—Employers Liability Act, 1880 (43 and 44 Vict. cap. 42)—Scope of Employment, and of foreman's authority.

11. During the execution of a contract for laying concrete in the premises of a tramway company, the foreman of the contractor had been in the habit of giving orders to the labourers employed under him to come ten minutes before their ordinary work hours each morning to remove from the sheds certain tram-cars which obstructed their work, but which it was the duty of the company to have removed daily. In an action of damages raised by one of the labourers, who had been injured in assisting to remove the cars, against the contractor, on the ground that the accident had been caused by the fault of his foreman, the defender alleged and adduced evidence to the effect that the removal of the cars did not fall within his contract, and that the employment of his men in this work by the foreman was without his knowledge, and was not authorised by him, and pleaded that he was not responsible. Held that the foreman's orders for removal of the cars, being in furtherance of the contract work, were orders which the labourers were bound to obey, and that the defender was responsible under the Employers Liability Act for the negligence of his foreman; dis. Lord Craighill, on the grounds that in removing the cars the labourer was not working in the contractor's employment, and that the order to remove the cars was not within the scope of the foreman's authority. Sweeney v. M'Gilvray, Nov. 23, 1886, p. 105.

REPARATION—Continued.

Master and Servant—Power of manager to delegate his duty of superintendence.

12. While the manager of a quarry may in ordinary circumstances delegate his duty of personally superintending particular operations in the quarry, yet, if the operation be one of peculiar difficulty, danger, and rarity, it is his duty personally to superintend it, and if he neglects to do so, and one of the workmen taking part in the operation is injured, the fact of his absence will be a ground for rendering his employer liable in damages to the injured workman, under the Employers Liability Act, 1880. Cook v. Stark, Oct. 15, 1886, p. 1.

Master and Servant—Employers Liability Act, 1880 (43 and 44 Vict. cap. 42), secs. 1 and 2—Tramway "Plant"—"Superior Servant."

13. By the Employers Liability Act, 1880, an employer is made liable to any workman employed by him for injury arising from defects of the plant used in his business, when the defect has arisen from, or has not been discovered and remedied owing to the negligence of the employer, or of some person entrusted by him with the duty of seeing that the plant is in proper condition. But the injured workman is not entitled to reparation if he knew of the defect or negligence and failed to give information thereof to his employer, or to a servant superior to himself, unless he was aware that the employer or such superior already knew of the defect or negligence. In an action of damages brought under the Act by a trace-boy, employed by a tramway company, against his employers, it was proved that the pursuer had been injured by the falling of a horse, on which he was riding, in the performance of his duty, that the horse was in a defective and dangerous condition and had been so for some time before the accident, and had fallen on several occasions with other trace-boys. The pursuer had made no complaint as to the unfitness of the horse, either to the company itself or to their servants, but it was proved that its liability to fall was well known among the trace-boys and stablemen. Held that the company were liable in damages, the Court being of opinion (1) that the horse was part of the company's plant in the sense of the Act, and was defective, and (2) that, in the circumstances, servants of the company superior to the trace-boy must be held to have been aware of the horse's unfitness. Haston v. Edinburgh Street Tramways Co., Limited, March 11, 1887, p. 621.

Master and Servant—Employers Liability Act, 1880 (43 and 44 Vict. c. 42), sec. 1—Defect in condition of way.

14. In an action brought by a miner against his employer for damages at common law or under the Employers Liability Act, the pursuer averred that when attending a horse in the mine he was knocked down by it, and that he was seriously injured by falling on a sleeper with a nail protruding from it, which had been left on the roadway through the fault of the roadsman. Held that there was no relevant averment that the road was in a defective condition, or that the accident was caused by the fault of the defender. M'Quade v. Wm. Dixon, Limited, July 19, 1887, p. 1039.

Master and Servant—Master's liability for servant's fault.

15. A shopkeeper instructed his salesman to remove certain articles from one of his shops to another. The salesman borrowed a van from a friend, who came with it to drive it, and the articles were placed on it with the shopkeeper's knowledge and assent. While the van was passing through the streets the salesman assumed the reins because his friend had become intoxicated, and owing to his careless driving an accident occurred. Held (dis. Lord Craighill) that the shopkeeper was not responsible for the consequences of the accident, because the salesman was acting outwith his duty in undertaking to drive the van. Martin v. Wards, June 15, 1887, p. 814.

Precautions for public safety—Fastening of a shed.

16. The front of a peat shed was closed by a door or shutter, 6 feet 3 inches in height, and 2½ cwt. in weight. This door was not hinged, but fitted into a frame, and was lifted bodily out when it was desired to open the shed. It was fitted with louver boards, which could be opened from the outside, and which, when opened, enabled children to climb up the face of the door. The only fastening which prevented the door from falling outwards was an iron drop-bar, 3½ inches long, at the top. While this was in its place the door could not be opened. The shed stood on waste ground open to the public and frequented by children. As three children of about ten years of age were playing about the shed, two of them climbed on the front of the door, and lifted the drop-bar, the consequence being that the door fell out and injured the third. Held that the owner of the shed was liable in damages, the fastening of the door not being sufficient for a shed standing in such a public place. Findlay v. Angus, Jan. 14, 1887, p. 312.

REPARATION—Continued.

Precautions for public safety—Liability to persons entering manufacturer's store.

17. A man, on a winter evening, entered the store of an oil manufacturer (who had an office in another part of the town for business purposes), desiring to buy old barrels for firewood. Being directed by one of the employees to go upstairs to a clerk, he went up, and was informed by the clerk that (as was the fact) the manufacturer never sold old barrels. On his way back he was killed by falling into the well of a hoist in the store. This hoist was situated in the course which a person unacquainted with the locality (as the man in question was) would naturally take in leaving the clerk's office, unless the well was either fenced or lighted, which it was not at the time, though there were the means of doing both. In an action by the representatives of the deceased against the proprietor of the store, held that the deceased entered the premises for a legitimate purpose, that his death was attributable to the negligence of the defender in failing to light and fence the well of the hoist, and that therefore the defender was liable in damages to the pursuers. Brady v. Parker, June 7, 1887, p. 783.

River—Liability of upper heritor in respect of operations in alveo.

18. A farm road, running midway along the steep face of a hill, was carried through the bed of a little burn upon an embankment or breastwork, built up by the proprietor so as to keep the road on a level, the burn running over the surface of the road. The embankment had been there for upwards of forty years, and had been repaired and strengthened from time to time. In 1884 the proprietor put sheep drains into his farm, and at the same time increased the breadth of the embankment. A lower heritor, who had been injured in the autumn of 1885 by an extraordinary flood in the burn, raised an action of damages against the upper proprietor, averring that the flood had been caused by the flood-water of the burn being obstructed by the stones and rubbish which had gradually gathered across its course upon the embankment, and so diverted out of its proper channel against his property. The Court held that in point of fact the overflow had not been caused in that way, and had not happened at that point. Opinions (per Lord Justice-Clerk, Lord Young, and Lord Craighill) that the proprietor would not have been liable even if the flood had been due to the embankment, the operations of the upper proprietor having been lawful and ordinary operations, involving no risk of damage except from some extraordinary cause. Filshill v. Campbell, March 10, 1887, p. 592.

Road—Duty of driver.

19. Foot-passengers on a country road with footpaths on either side are entitled to walk upon the road itself, and the drivers of vehicles are bound to keep clear of them. M'Kechnie v. Couper, Jan. 20, 1887, p. 345.

See also 7, supra.

Road—Harbour Commissioners—Obligation to provide improved plant.

20. Harbour Commissioners, as empowered by their Acts of Parliament, laid down and maintained rails on the streets and quays adjoining the harbour. A horse crossing the rails on its way to a ship in the harbour was injured through its foot being caught in the space left between the rail and the causeway blocks for the flanges of waggon-wheels. The owner of the horse brought an action against the Harbour Commissioners, alleging that a new and improved description of rail, which would have rendered the accident unlikely, had been introduced since the rails were laid down, and pleading that it was the duty of the commissioners to have substituted such rails for those in use at the time of the accident. Held (dub. Lord Young) that although the new rails were on the whole of a safer description than the old, the Commissioners had not been negligent in continuing the use of the old, which were of the form common at the date when they were laid down. Defenders therefore assolviéd. Wisely v. Aberdeen Harbour Commissioners, Feb. 2, 1887, p. 445.

REPARATION—Continued.

Ship—Trawler—Sea Fisheries Act, 1883 (46 and 47 Vict. cap. 22).

21. In an action of damages by fishermen against a trawler held, after a proof, that the defenders had proved that the loss sustained did not result from their fault, in the sense of sched. art. xix. of the above Act. Defenders therefore assolviéd. Lealies v. Walker, &c., Dec. 18, 1886, p. 288.

Slander—Wrongous apprehension—Malice and want of probable cause.

22. In an action of damages for alleged wrongous apprehension, the pursuer averred that he had passed the night in a hotel, and had left in the morning to attend a market in the neighbourhood without paying his bill; that he had not returned to do so, but that when seated in the train in the afternoon on his way home he had beckoned to the innkeeper (the defender), whom he saw on the platform, and was told by him that the amount of the bill was 3s. 6d.; that he then produced a £1 note, and without parting with it received from the innkeeper the 16s. 6d. of change, and that while they were discussing the proper amount due the train left the station, the pursuer taking both sums with him; that the defender forthwith telegraphed, or caused the constable on duty to telegraph, to the police authorities at next station to have the pursuer arrested on a charge of theft; that the pursuer was apprehended at the next station, which was his destination and that on the following day the defender falsely, maliciously, recklessly, and without probable cause, informed, or caused to be informed, the procurator-fiscal that the pursuer had stolen 16s. 6d., and that he did this for the purpose of inducing him to prosecute the pursuer as being guilty of said crime. It was not stated that the pursuer was known to the defender, or that the latter even knew what he was or where he lived. The Court allowed the pursuer an issue. Urquhart v. M'Kenzie, Oct. 30, 1886, p. 18.

Slander—Privilege—Malice—Public officer.

23. A police-officer brought an action of damages for slander against an inspector of police and a procurator-fiscal, stating that they, acting in concert, or one or other of them, had maliciously and without probable cause prepared and sent to the pursuer's superior officer, the chief constable of the county, a report, falsely stating that there were current in certain parts of the county rumours to the effect that he had been guilty of immoral conduct and that an official investigation as to his conduct was required, in consequence of which report he had been suspended for a time from duty, and had suffered in feelings and reputation. Held, having regard to the nature of the report and its privileged character, that in order to the relevancy of such an action a specific statement of the grounds on which malice was to be inferred was required, and that such not being given, the action was irrelevant.

Opinion that an action will not lie against a public officer in respect of defamatory statements made in a report sent in the discharge of his duty to his superior officer. M'Murphy v. Campbell, May 21, 1887, p. 725.

Compare 32 infra.

Slander—Judicial slander—Malice.

24. In an action for damages for judicial slander the pursuer must aver facts and circumstances from which the jury may reasonably infer malice. Averments of facts and circumstances which were held relevant to support an issue for judicial slander. Gordon v. British and Foreign Metaline Co., &c., Nov. 16, 1886, p. 75.

REPARATION—Continued.

Slander—Judicial slander.

25. Held (rev. judgment of Lord M'Laren) that an action of damages for judicial slander is relevant although the matter alleged to be libellous formed the whole subject-matter of the original action. Gordon v. British and Foreign Metaline Co., &c., Nov. 16, 1886, p. 75.

Slander—Partnership.

26. A company or a private partnership may be sued for damages for judicial slander, notwithstanding that malice must be proved against the defenders. Gordon v. British and Foreign Metaline Co., &c., Nov. 16, 1886, p. 75.
27. Where the officials of a company had prepared and published, but without the authority, knowledge, or assent of the directors, a libellous circular concerning another company, and the latter company asked for interdict against the former circulating the document in question, the Court found that the publication and circulation by the officials of the defenders' company having been allowed to continue after the action was raised and the facts were brought to the knowledge of the directors, the pursuers were entitled to interdict. British Legal Life Assurance and Loan Co., Limited, v. Pearl Life Assurance Co., Limited, June 15, 1887, p. 818.

Slander—Province of Judge and of jury.

28. A person charged with having contravened the Weights and Measures Act, 1878, by having in his possession or using measures which were not of any Board of Trade standard, and were false or unjust, was convicted of the offence except in so far as it was charged that his measures were false or unjust. He afterwards brought an action of damages against the printer and publisher of a newspaper for slander contained in an article commenting on the case, which, upon the face of it, assumed that there had been a conviction upon both charges. There was no issue of justification, and the defender in his defences offered a retraction and apology, and a nominal sum of damages, and in the witness-box admitted that the article charged the pursuer with dishonest conduct. The presiding Judge (Lord M'Laren) told the jury that it was for them to consider whether the article was false and calumnious, and no exception was taken to his charge. The jury having returned a verdict for the defender, the Court granted a new trial upon the ground that the verdict was contrary to evidence—dis. Lord M'Laren, who held that it being the province of the jury and not of the Court to determine whether the article was or was not a defamatory libel, their verdict affirming that it did not exceed the limits of fair criticism ought not to be interfered with. Ross v. M'Kittrick, Dec. 17, 1886, p. 255.

Slander—Publication of decrees of Court—Trade Protection Society.

29. A private firm instituted an agency which they described in a prospectus as "a medium for interchange of information, by enabling the trading classes to communicate one to another their knowledge of doubtful and habit and repute bad payers." The prospectus stated, "A book is issued to subscribers containing upwards of 1000 names and addresses of people against whom decrees in absence has been obtained." The firm issued to their subscribers a list headed "List of Names," Edinburgh, 1885, and containing simply names and addresses. The list in point of fact contained the names (to a certain extent selected) of persons against whom decree in absence had been granted in the Small-Debt Court of the county during several months previous to publication. Prefixed to the list was a leaflet headed "Caution," which stated, "It is possible that there are names contained in this list of people to whom credit under certain circumstances might be given, but it is recommended that use be made of the inquiry department of the agency before the entailing the risk." In an action of damages for slander, raised by a person whose name appeared in the list, against the firm, held that the defenders, by means of the list of names and "caution" circulated by them, had slandered the pursuer, and were liable in damages. Damages assessed at £5. Andrews v. Drummond & Graham, March 5, 1887, p. 568.

REPARATION—Continued.

Slander.

30. Nominal damages—Expenses. Bonnar v. Roden, June 1, 1887, p. 761.

Slander—Newspaper article—Parliamentary Election.

31. During a contest for a seat in Parliament a newspaper published an article concerning one of the candidates, in which he was described as a “scoffer,” who talked in a “morally offensive way,” and spoke sarcastically about “God Almighty’s earth.” In an action of damages against the proprietor of the newspaper, held (rev. judgment of Lord M’Laren) that the expression “scoffer” was prima facie defamatory, and that the candidate was entitled to an issue, putting the question whether the article falsely and calumniously represented him as a “scoffer at religion, as morally offensive in his public addresses, and as sneering at the Divine Government and Providence.”

During a parliamentary election a newspaper stated that it was alleged that a boat’s crew from the yacht of one of the candidates was captured while poaching, and that it was “affirmed” that a boat’s crew from his yacht had been seen fishing on a Sunday. In an action of damages raised by him, held (diss. Lord Young) that he was not entitled to an issue, as it was not averred that the acts alleged had been done with the pursuer’s knowledge or authority. Macfarlane v. Black & Co., July 6, 1887, p. 870.

Wrongous apprehension—Public officer—Malice.

32. In order to found a relevant action of damages against a public officer for a wrongful official act, it is not enough to aver malice in general terms, but facts and circumstances must be set forth from which the Court or a jury may legitimately infer that the defender was not acting in the discharge of his duty, but from a malicious motive.

Observed that there may be cases between private individuals where a general averment of malice may be sufficient. Beaton v. Ivory, July 19, 1887, p. 1057.

Assessment of damages for infringement of patent. See Patent, 2.

RES JUDICATA. Identity of parties.

A plea of res judicata sustained against a claimant in a multipoleinding claiming upon a title upon the future and contingent possession of which another person had founded unsuccessfully in a previous process with reference to the same fund. M’Caig v. Maitland, Jan. 5, 1887, p. 295.

RETENTION. Lien of Company over shares for debts due by shareholder.

1. A limited company, incorporated under the Companies Acts, has, at common law, a right of retention over the shares of a partner in security of debts due by him to the company. Bell’s Trustee v. Coatbridge Tinplate Co., Limited, Dec. 17, 1886, p. 246.

Lease—Retention of rent—Partial destruction of subject.

2. Held that a tenant is not bound to pay the full rent if, during possession, through no fault of his own, he loses the beneficial enjoyment of part of the subject let, and that his claim to abatement may be stated by way of defence to an action for payment of the full rent. Muir v. M’Intyres, Feb. 4, 1887, p. 470.

Deposit.

3. Held that a depository was bound to restore to the depositor the balance that remained of a fund deposited to meet a contingent claim when that claim had been ascertained and satisfied, and was not entitled to retain any part of the balance on the plea that he himself had a claim against the depositor for expenses incurred in ascertaining by arbitration the amount of the contingent claim to meet which the fund was deposited. M’Gregor v. Alley & M’Lellan, March 4, 1887, p. 535.

REVENUE. Income-Tax—Schedule D, Cases I. and IV.—Foreign investments.

1. A Scottish company which had invested funds in America, instead of bringing home the interest, invested it in America, but deducted an equivalent amount from capital raised in this country for transmission to America for investment. The amount so deducted was divided as income among the shareholders. Held that the interest was to be regarded as interest received in this country, and was therefore liable to assessment for income-tax under the fourth case of schedule D of the Income-Tax Act, 1842.

REVENUE—Continued.

A Scottish company which carried on the business of borrowing money in this country and lending it on American securities, having been charged with income-tax on interest received from American investments under the fourth case of schedule D, objected to the assessment on the ground that the company, as a trading company, could only be assessed upon its profits under the first case of schedule D. Held that the assessment under the fourth case was competent. Scottish Mortgage and Land Investment Co. of New Mexico v. Commissioners of Inland Revenue, Nov. 19, 1886, p. 98.

2. A company carrying on the business of borrowing money in this country and investing it abroad may, in the option of the Surveyor of Taxes, be assessed for income-tax under schedule D either upon profits under the first case or upon the interest received from abroad under the fourth case of that schedule. Surveyor of Taxes v. Northern Investment Co. of New Zealand, Limited, May 31, 1887, p. 734.

Income-tax—Burgh water-works.

3. The Hamilton Water-Works Commissioners, by local Act, were empowered (1) to charge a "domestic water-rate on all premises within the town which were supplied with water; (2) to levy a "public water-rate" upon all premises within the town whether supplied with water or not; and (3) to sell water for other than domestic uses at such rates as should be agreed upon. The Commissioners annually made up a tariff of charges for supply under this head. It was further provided that the supply for domestic use should not be held to include a supply "for railway purposes or for public baths, or for public establishments." The barracks, which were within burgh, did not pay the domestic rate, but paid for water supplied to them according to measurement at the tariff rate. Held that the payment thus derived was profit, and liable to assessment for income-tax under schedule D. Allan v. Hamilton Water-Works Commissioners, Feb. 22, 1887, p. 485.

Income-tax—Schedule D, Cases I. and II., Rule first—Deduction for value of premises occupied as dwelling-house.

4. A bank was charged with income-tax under schedule A of the Income-Tax Act, 1842, on certain premises belonging to it in which it carried on its business, and which were also to some extent occupied as dwelling-houses by the manager and agents, that accommodation being given by the bank to them as part of their emoluments. In assessing the bank for income-tax under schedule D, the Income-Tax Commissioners refused to allow deduction from the gross profits of the bank of the annual value of these premises, in so far as they were occupied as dwelling-houses. In an appeal held that the bank was entitled to deduct the value of the whole premises in question—the portions used as dwelling-houses not being beneficially enjoyed as such by the bank. Town and County Bank, Limited, v. Inland Revenue, March 4, 1887, p. 528.

Corporation Tax—Customs and Inland Revenue Act, 1885 (48 and 49 Vict. cap. 51), sec. 11—Exemptions.

5. Held that a building belonging to and occupied as a library by the Society of Writers to the Signet did not fall within the exemption contained in the 11th section of the Customs and Inland Revenue Act, 1885.

Held that the income of the Society of Writers to the Signet was exempt from duty to the extent of £105 per annum, appropriated by contract to the perpetual endowment of a chair of conveyancing in a university.

Held further, that the exemption under the same section of "property acquired by or with funds voluntarily contributed to any body, corporate or unincorporate, within a period of thirty years immediately preceding" was solely applicable to property acquired by funds gratuitously given, and did not cover property acquired by monies paid by those entering the Society as a necessary condition of their obtaining admission.

REVENUE—Continued.

Held that deductions fell to be made from the annual value and income, before assessment, of (1) land-tax, and the owner's proportion of rates; (2) premium of insurance on the subjects assessed; (3) reasonable remuneration to the treasurer for drawing the Society's income; and (4) an allowance for repairs. Society of Writers to the Signet v. Commissioners of Inland Revenue, Nov. 3, 1886, p. 34.

6. Held that funds belonging to an incorporated body, which were derived from the entry-moneys of members and were solely applicable as pensions to decayed members and widows of members at the absolute discretion of certain office-bearers, were not to be regarded as funds appropriated "to a charitable purpose" in the sense of the statute. Incorporation of Tailors in Glasgow v. Inland Revenue, May 26, 1887, p. 729.

Customs—Contraband—Evidence of accused—Customs Consolidation Act, 1876 (39 and 40 Vict. cap. 36), secs. 179, 259.

7. Certain foreigners were convicted and sentenced before a Justice of Peace Court, upon a complaint under the 179th section of the Customs Consolidation Act, 1876, charging them with having on board a foreign ship, within one league of the British coast, packages of spirits, tobacco, &c., of a size and character which are prohibited to be imported. In an appeal against the conviction, held that the Judge in the inferior Court had rightly declined to admit the evidence of the accused, section 259 of the Customs Law Consolidation Act, 1876, which admits such evidence in certain circumstances, not being applicable to the case.

Held further, that it was not a good objection to the conviction that the evidence had not been recorded by the Judge in the inferior Court, the accused not having asked him to do so. Dodsworth v. Rijnbergen, &c., Dec. 15, 1886, p. 238.

REVOCATION. See Succession, 10.

RIGHT IN SECURITY. Absolute disposition with back-letter—Advances by third party on assignation of reversionary interest intimated to the disponee.

1. A bank held a recorded absolute disposition granted by A of certain subjects, which by back-letter it agreed to hold "in security, and until full and final payment of all sums of money now due, or which may hereafter become due." The back-letter was not recorded. Some months afterwards A, for onerous considerations, granted to another bank a deed by which she alienated, assigned, and disposed her whole right and interest and right of reversion in the subjects. Intimation of the assignation was made to the first bank. Thereafter advances were made to A by both banks. In a competition between the two banks, held (rev. judgment of the Court of Session) that, in a question between the two banks, the first bank's security was limited to advances made prior to the date when the assignation was intimated. Union Bank of Scotland, Limited, v. National Bank of Scotland, Limited, Dec. 10, 1886, H. L., p. 1.

Bond and disposition in security—Personal obligation—Sale.

2. The creditor in a bond and disposition in security in the form prescribed by the Titles to Land Consolidation Act, 1868, and containing the usual clause consenting to registration for execution, gave notice requiring payment of his loan along with the usual three months' premonition that failing payment he might proceed to sell. Immediately thereafter the creditor charged the debtor on the personal obligation contained in the bond. The debtor having brought a suspension of the charge, held that the creditor was entitled to both remedies, and note refused accordingly. M'Whirter v. M'Culloch's Trustees, July 9, 1887, p. 918.

See Bankruptcy, 9—Insurance, 1—Minor and Pupil, 2.

RIVER, LOCH, SEA. River—Liability of upper heritor in respect of operations in alveo.

1. A farm road, running midway along the steep face of a hill, was carried through the bed of a little burn upon an embankment or breastwork, built up by the proprietor so as to keep the road on a level, the burn running over the surface of the road. The embankment had been there for upwards of forty years, and had been repaired and strengthened from time to time. In 1884 the proprietor put sheep drains into his farm, and at the same time increased the breadth of the embankment. A lower heritor, who had been injured in the autumn of 1885 by an extraordinary flood in the burn, raised an action of damages against the upper proprietor, averring that the flood had been caused by the flood-water of the burn being obstructed by the stones and rubbish which had gradually gathered across its course upon the embankment, and so diverted out of its proper channel against his property. The Court held that in point of fact the overflow had not been caused in that way, and had not happened at that point. Opinions (per Lord Justice-Clerk, Lord Young, and Lord Craighill) that the proprietor would not have been liable even if the flood had been due to the embankment, the operations of the upper proprietor having been lawful and ordinary operations, involving no risk of damage except from some extraordinary cause. Filshill v. Campbell, March 10, 1887, p. 592.

River—Tidal and Navigable river—White fishings—Acts Anne 1705, cap. 2, and 29 Geo. II. cap. 23.

2. A member of the public brought an action against the riparian proprietor concluding for declarator that he had a right to fish with single rod and line for floating white fish, including trout, flounders, eels, and any other sort of floating white fish which were not of the salmon kind, in that part of the river Doon where the tide ebbed and flowed, and as far as the highest point reached by the ordinary spring-tides; and averred that the portion of the Doon so described extended from the sea to a distance of about 500 yards inland. The action was founded both on common law and the Acts of Anne, 1705, cap. 2, and 29 Geo. II. cap. 23. Held, after a proof, (1) that the Doon between the points in question was neither a tidal nor a navigable river, and that the pursuer was not entitled to declarator either at common law or under the statutes; and (2) that the defender under his titles had right to the whole fishings therein, and had had from time immemorial exclusive possession thereof. Defender therefore assoiized. Bowie v. Marquis of Ailsa, March 18, 1887, p. 649.

Sea—Foreshore—Line of high-water mark.

3. Held (per Lord Trayner, Ordinary) that the right of the Crown in the sea-shore extends to the line of high-water of ordinary spring tides, and is not limited (as is the rule in England) to the line reached by the average of the medium high tides between the spring and the neap. Bowie v. Marquis of Ailsa, March 18, 1887, p. 649.

Sea—Foreshore—Burgh—Title of Magistrates to resist declarator of property of foreshore.

4. In an action raised in 1885 against the magistrates of a burgh (and also against the Crown, which did not defend), by the proprietor of lands within the burgh for declarator of property in the foreshore ex adverso of these lands, the pursuer produced as his immediate title a disposition from a subject to the foreshore dated in 1884. Held (1) that as the inhabitants of the burgh had been in use from time immemorial to resort to the foreshore for purposes of recreation, that was sufficient to give the magistrates a title to challenge the disposition of 1884; and (2) that as the prior titles produced shewed that the disposition of 1884 flowed a non habente potestatem, the defenders fell to be assoiized. Keiller v. Magistrates of Dundee, Dec. 7, 1886, p. 191.

Sea—Foreshore—Burgh—Jus spatiandi—Act to extend the royalty of Dundee, 1831 (1 and 2 Will. IV. cap. xlv.).

5. Held that the above Act did not transfer the property of the foreshore ex adverso of the extended royalty of the burgh of Dundee from the Crown to the Magistrates as representing the burgh.

RIVER, LOCH, SEA—Continued.

A proprietor of land within the extended royalty of the burgh of Dundee held a conveyance from the Crown, dated in 1853, "of all right, title, and interest of Her Majesty, her heirs and successors," in a portion of the foreshore ex adverso of his property, lying between high-water mark and a line of railway formed along the foreshore. Held, in a declarator at his instance against the magistrates (1) that the pursuer had a right of property in this piece of foreshore; but (2) that, as the inhabitants of Dundee had used it from time immemorial for purposes of recreation, he had no right to exclude them from resorting thither for such purposes. Scott v. Magistrates of Dundee, Dec. 7, 1886, p. 191.

Sea—Foreshore—Possession—Prescription.

6. A proprietor, with titles dating from 1804, flowing from a subject-superior, which described his property as "bounded on the south by the sea," brought a declarator of property in the seashore ex adverso of his lands against the Crown. As he could not recover his immediate superior's titles, he founded on his own possession on his own titles. He proved that one of his predecessors under the subject-superior had built a retaining wall whereby a considerable portion of the foreshore was reclaimed, that he and they had for more than the prescriptive period been in use to cart drift sea-ware (no ware grew on the shore) in large quantities from the shore for manure, that they had occasionally taken stones or gravel from the shore for various purposes, and that they had built and used a private bathing-house on the shore. The Crown in defence proved that a large quantity of stones had been taken (by fishermen in their boats) from that part of the coast to build a public breakwater, but it was not shewn that any considerable quantity had been taken from the part of the foreshore claimed by the pursuer, or that he or his authors knew what was being done. The Crown further proved that members of the public had taken sea-ware from the foreshore claimed by the pursuer, in creels or in barrows (but they never did so in carts, having only a right of access by foot to that part of the shore); and that they had also taken whelks, mussels, and other shellfish, and shot gulls on the foreshore.

Held (aff. judgment of Second Division) that the pursuer had established a case of prescriptive possession, and was entitled to decree of declarator accordingly. Young v. North British Railway Co. and the Lord Advocate, August 1, 1887, H. L., p. 53.

See Insurance, 3.

ROAD. Right of way—Evidence of public use.

1. In an action of declarator that there existed a public right of way for passengers on foot and on horseback, and for driving cattle and sheep through the Glen of the Doll in Forfarshire, it was proved that the pass formed the direct and natural access from Clova to Braemar, and that from time immemorial there had existed a well-known and well-defined track through the glen; that there had been a practice of drovers taking sheep by this track from the public market at Braemar in spring and autumn to a public market near Kirriemuir; that the track had been used by farmers in the district going to Clova or to Braemar, and occasionally by tourists going between these places; that there had been a repute in the district, both among the public and the proprietors of the ground over which the track passed, that there was a public right of way. Held, on a consideration of the whole proof, that the use proved was, having regard to the nature of the district, sufficient in amount, and that it was to be attributed not to tolerance, but to the assertion of a public right. Scottish Rights of Way and Recreation Society, Limited, v. Macpherson, July 6, 1887, p. 875.

Statute Labour Road—Effect of closing road under statutory authority.

2. Held that a road over which the public had acquired a right of way for all purposes became thereby a statute labour road, whether the Statute Labour Trustees had allocated statute labour money to its maintenance or not.

ROAD—Continued.

Where a public road which is not shewn to have originated as a footpath is shut up as superfluous by the statutory authority, it is shut up for all purposes, and not merely as a cart and carriage road; but question whether the same result would follow if it were shewn that the road was one over which the public had acquired a right of footpath before it became a cart and carriage road. Hope Vere v. Young, Jan. 28, 1887, p. 425.

Rule of the road—Tramway-car.

3. Observed (per the Lord President) that the rule of the road requires that a tramway-car shall be passed by a following vehicle on the left-hand side. Jardine v. Stonefield Laundry Co., June 24, 1887, p. 839.

Foot-passengers—Duty of drivers towards.

4. Foot-passengers on a country road with footpaths on either side are entitled to walk upon the road itself, and the drivers of vehicles are bound to keep clear of them. M'Kechnie v. Couper, Jan. 20, 1887, p. 345.

Road trustees—Barbed wires.

5. A proprietor of lands bordering a public road is not entitled to erect a barbed wire fence along the road, where such fencing is dangerous to persons or bestial using the road, and road trustees have a good title to sue an action against the proprietor for the purpose of having him ordained to remove the fence. Elgin County Road Trustees v. Innes, Nov. 10, 1886, p. 48.

General Police and Improvement Act, 1862 (25 and 26 Vict. cap. 101), sec. 397—Private Street—Notice.

6. The Commissioners of a burgh put up a notice at the market cross, and at each end of a road which had long been used as a public road, intimating the intention of the Commissioners "to fix the level" of the road, "to make the roadway thereof, and a footpath on both sides, with kerb and gutters," but the notice did not state that the road was to be dealt with as a private street (to which alone sec. 397 of the above Act applied), and did not shew that the Commissioners intended to hold the owners of property fronting or abutting on the road liable for the cost. In an action brought by the Commissioners against the owner of property abutting on the street for payment of a proportion of the cost, held (1) that the road was a private street, and (2) that the notice was sufficient under sec. 397 of the Act. Youden v. Jackson, July 16, 1887, p. 1001.

Roads and Bridges Act, 1878 (41 and 42 Vict. c. 51), sec. 32—Transference of statutory obligations.

7. Held (in rev. judgment of Second Division) that sec. 32 of the Roads and Bridges Act, 1878, in providing that county road trustees to whom a road is thereby transferred shall be liable in all the debts, liabilities, claims and demands, in which the trustees of such road "are or were liable under any general or local Act then in force," does not continue and transfer to the county road trustees the statutory powers and duties conferred and imposed by such prior Acts upon the trustees from whom the road is transferred, and that county trustees are not entitled to spend money raised by assessment for the maintenance of a road in lighting the same, although the trustees from whom the road had been transferred were bound to do so under a local Act. Lanarkshire (Lower Ward) Road Trustees v. Kelvinside Estate Trustees, Nov. 12, 1886, H. L., p. 18.

Roads and Bridges Act, 1878 (41 and 42 Vict. cap. 51), secs. 37 and 88—Bridge partly in burgh and partly in county, and accommodating traffic of other places—Apportionment of liability for maintenance.

8. Held (1) that while section 37 of the Roads and Bridges Act imposes the burden of maintaining a bridge, situate in more than one county, or burgh, on each equally, that provision does not apply in cases in which, under the 88th section, the Secretary of State determines that a bridge accommodates the traffic of a county or burgh in which it is not situate, and that in these cases the Secretary of State is empowered by section 88 to determine as he may see fit the proportions in which each county or burgh liable to contribute shall contribute to the expense of maintenance, &c.; and (2)

ROAD—Continued.

that any county or burgh so contributing to the maintenance of a bridge beyond its limits is entitled to take part in the management of the bridge, and to appoint representatives on the Joint Bridge Committee, appointed under section 39 of the Roads and Bridges Act, 1878. Lower Ward of Lanarkshire Road Trustees v. Magistrates of Glasgow, July 8, 1887, p. 890.

Roads and Bridges (Scotland) Act, 1878 (41 and 42 Vict. c. 51), secs. 54, 55, and 86—General Police and Improvement (Scotland) Act, 1862 (25 and 26 Vict. c. 110), secs. 87, 88, and 89.

9. Held on a construction of the foregoing and relative provisions of the above Acts, that the occupiers of houses within a burgh, under the Roads and Bridges Act, 1878, are entitled to the exemptions provided to occupiers by the 87th, 88th, and 89th sections of the General Police and Improvement Act, 1862, but that the exemptions were inapplicable to an assessment imposed on owners as such.

Held further, that the 86th section of the Roads and Bridges Act, in giving the local authority power to relieve occupiers of lands and heritages under the annual value of £4 on the ground of poverty, was not inconsistent with and did not supersede the power given under the 88th section of the General Police and Improvement Act to remit payment of the assessment under the Roads and Bridges Act on the ground of poverty irrespective of the amount of rent. Govan Police Commissioners v. Armour, Feb. 3, 1887, p. 461.

Roads and Bridges Act, 1878 (41 and 42 Vict. c. 51), sec. 54.

10. Held (diss. Lord Rutherford Clark) that under sec. 54 of the Roads and Bridges Act, 1878, the commissioners were to levy from the individual owners and occupiers such equal rate per pound as would produce the aggregate sum required, and that the principle of Galloway v. Nicolson, March 19, 1875, 2 R. 650, under which the aggregate sum required would have been divided into two equal parts, and the one part levied from the owners as a class, and the other from the occupiers as a class, did not apply. Govan Police Commissioners v. Armour, Feb. 3, 1887, p. 461.

Roads and Bridges Act, 1878, sec. 119—Maintenance of Roads—Lighting.

11. Held (rev. judgment of Second Division) that sums raised by assessment under the Roads and Bridges Act, 1878, for "maintaining and repairing" roads cannot be applied to light them. Lanarkshire (Lower Ward) Trustees v. Kelvin-side Estate Trustees, Nov. 12, 1886, H. L., p. 18.
See Justiciary Cases, 8—Reparation, 20.

SCHOOL. Powers of school board—Use of buildings.

1. A school board has a discretion to allow the use of its schools for purposes which do not interfere with proper educational purposes.

Held that a country school board had not abused this discretion by granting its school for five days in vacation to a charitable society to be used as a sleeping and cooking place for a large number of poor children brought from a town for a holiday. Hunter v. School Board of Lochgilphead, Dec. 1, 1886, p. 135.

Educational Endowments Act, 1882 (45 and 46 Vict. c. 59)—Discretion of the Commissioners.

2. Held that the Court could not review the Commissioners under the above Act in the exercise of their discretion in determining the proportion of the endowment to be applied to educational purposes in the case of a mixed endowment, or as to the proper amount of regard to be shewn to the spirit of the founder's intention. Ferguson Bequest Fund v. Commissioners on Educational Endowments, March 15, 1887, p. 624.

Prosecution for failure to educate.

3. In order to a prosecution for failure to educate children it is essential that there should be produced either a certificate of failure to educate under section 70 of the Education Act, 1872, or an attendance order under sections 9 and 10 of that of 1883. Macaulay v. Macdonald, June 4, 1887, Just. Cases, p. 43.

SCHOOL—Continued.

SEA. See River, &c., 3, 4, 5, 6.

SERVITUDE. See Property, 1.

SHERIFF. Jurisdiction—Public Trust.

1. Question whether the Sheriff has jurisdiction to control the managers of public property in their administration. Opinion (per Lord Young) that he has not. Hunter v. School Board of Lochgilphead, Dec. 1, 1886, p. 135.

Jurisdiction—Executor.

2. Held that the fact that confirmation of an executor has been taken out in the Sheriff Court of the deceased's domicile does not of itself subject the executors to the jurisdiction of that Court, and that an action will not lie against them if none of them is resident within that jurisdiction. Halliday's Executor v. Halliday's Executors, Dec. 17, 1886, p. 251.

Jurisdiction—Declarator—Sheriff Court Act, 1877 (40 and 41 Vict. cap. 50), sec. 8—Value of subjects.

3. Question, whether in an action of declarator in the Sheriff Court under the Sheriff Courts Act, 1877, the value of the subjects is to be determined by reference to the pursuer's or to the defender's interest. Bowie v. Marquis of Ailsa, March 18, 1887, p. 649.

Jurisdiction—Alkali, &c. Works Regulations Act, 1881 (44 and 45 Vict. cap. 37)—Summary Jurisdiction (Scotland) Acts, 1864 and 1881.

4. Held that proceedings for recovering the fines imposed by the above statute fall within the Sheriff's criminal jurisdiction, and are competently brought by way of complaint under the Summary Jurisdiction Acts, 1864 and 1881. Fletcher v. Eglinton Chemical Co., Limited, Nov. 13, 1886, Just. Cases, p. 9.

Procedure—Sheriff Court Act, 1876 (39 and 40 Vict. cap. 70), sec. 6.

5. Question, whether petitions in the Sheriff Court for sequestration under the Bankruptcy Act, 1856, must be in the form prescribed by the 6th section of the Sheriff Court Act, 1876. Opinion (per Lord Young) that they need not. Cuthbertson v. Gibson, May 31, 1887, p. 736.

Expenses—Employment of counsel.

6. In a Sheriff Court action both parties appeared by counsel at the proof and debate thereon. The Sheriff-substitute having assoilzied the defender, with expenses, the pursuer appealed to the Court of Session. The Court affirmed the judgment, and remitted the defender's account of expenses to the Auditor. At the taxation on 8th July 1887 the Auditor disallowed the charges for instructing counsel in the Sheriff Court, because no application had been made to the Sheriff-substitute while the case was in the Sheriff Court, either for authority to employ counsel, or for approval of their employment. After the taxation the agent for the defender presented to the Auditor a certificate by the Sheriff-substitute, dated 7th July 1887, stating that counsel were employed with his approval. The Auditor was of opinion that the certificate was too late, but reported the point to the Court. Held that the sum fell to be added to the amount of the defender's taxed expenses. M'Kercher v. M'Quarrie, July 19, 1887, p. 1038.

Debts Recovery Act, 1867 (30 and 31 Vict. c. 96), sec. 17—Review in debts recovery actions.

7. A person against whom a decree had been obtained in the Debts Recovery Court brought a reduction thereof in the Court of Session, on the ground that the Sheriff had refused to hear evidence tendered by him. Held that the action of reduction was incompetent under sec. 17 of the Debts Recovery Act, 1867. Robertson v. Pringle, Feb. 5, 1887, p. 474.

SHIP. Carriage of goods—Condition—Construction of contract.

1. Question, whether a printed circular post-card sent by shipowners to possible shippers of goods in Galway, which stated that the s.s. "Clara" would sail from Glasgow to Galway on a date named, and contained this intimation:

SHIP—Continued.

—"All goods carried on conditions as per sailing bills," which conditions relieved the shipowners from all liability for the consequences of their own or their servants' fault, could be held to apply to the return voyage of the "Clara" from Galway to Glasgow, so as to import the conditions on the sailing bills into a contract for that voyage. Lightbody's Trustees v. J. & P. Hutchison, Oct. 16, 1886, p. 4.

Charter-party—Guarantee that vessel should carry a certain dead weight of cargo.

2. By charter-party for a voyage it was stipulated that the vessel (then at sea) should proceed to G., and there load all such goods and merchandise as the charterers should tender alongside for shipment, including machinery, the dimensions of the largest pieces thereof being specified, but not beyond what the ship could reasonably stow and carry; that the charterers should pay a slump freight for the voyage, of £2200; that the "owners guarantee that the vessel shall carry not less than 2000 tons dead weight of cargo"; that, "should the vessel not carry the guaranteed dead weight as above, any expense incurred from this cause to be borne by the owners, and a pro rata reduction per ton to be made" from the freight; and that a regular stevedore, to be appointed by the charterers, should be employed by the owners to stow the cargo, "to be paid by and to be under the direction of the master, who is responsible for improper stowage." The charterers tendered 2000 tons of cargo, consisting partly of pieces of machinery, partly of coal, and partly of general goods. Had the coal and the machinery been stowed together the whole cargo tendered could have been loaded, but as the coals and the machinery were stowed in separate holds, only 1691 tons were shipped. Held (diss. Lord Rutherford Clark) that the clause of guarantee imported a guarantee of the vessel's carrying capacity merely, but that the clause providing for a pro rata reduction applied if the vessel actually carried less than 2000 tons through no fault on either side, which the majority of the Court were of opinion was the case. Mackill & Co. v. Wright Brothers & Co., July 5, 1887, p. 863.

Sale—Purchaser's liability for furnishings prior to sale.

3. The owner of certain shares in a vessel sold them, and delivered a bill of sale to the purchaser. At the time the vessel was completely fitted and provisioned and laden with a cargo for a voyage under a charter-party. The ship was lost on the voyage. In an action subsequently brought by the managing owner against the purchaser for the proportion effeiring to his shares of the cost of repairs executed before the sale, and of provisions for the voyage, on the ground that he would have been entitled to a share of the freight if earned, held (1) that the purchaser was not liable for repairs executed prior to the sale, and (2) that although the cost of provisions for the voyage would have been a proper deduction from the gross freight if earned, yet as they had not been bought on the purchaser's credit he had incurred no liability. Carswell & Son v. Finlay, July 8, 1887, p. 903.

Master—Employment of person as master who has no certificate.

4. The owner of a whaling ship had on board her, in addition to a certificated master, a person designed in the ship's books as "icemaster in full charge" who held no certificate, but was a person of experience as a navigator among ice. He, under the instructions of the owner, assumed the charge of the navigation of the ship from the date of her departure from Scotland till she was lost in the Arctic Seas. The owner was convicted of having, in contravention of the 136th section of the Merchant Shipping Act, 1854 (17 and 18 Vict. cap. 104), employed a person as master who had no certificate as such. Conviction quashed. Heslop v. Cadenhead, June 4, 1887, Just. Cases, p. 35.

See Arrestment, 1—Expenses, 8—Justiciary Cases, 1.

STAMP. Promissory-note—Stamp Act, 1870 (33 and 34 Vict. cap. 97), sec. 17, 54.

1. In an action to recover the amount contained in a foreign promissory-note, which, at the date of the action, was properly stamped, held that an averment that, when originally presented for payment in the United Kingdom, it was unstamped, was irrelevant, since presentation without a stamp did not involve nullity. Broddelius v. Grischotti, March 4, 1887, p. 536.

STAMP—Continued.

"Conveyance on sale" proceeding upon verdict of jury under Lands Clauses Act, 1845—Sum in name of compensation of loss of business—Stamp Act, 1870 (33 and 34 Vict. cap. 97), sec. 70.

2. In a compulsory sale under the Lands Clauses Act, 1845, a jury awarded the owners of the subjects, who were also the occupants, three specific sums (1) for the value of land taken, (2) for the value of buildings, machinery, plant, &c., and (3) for compensation for loss of business previously carried on by them on the premises in question. The verdict of the jury was incorporated in the supervening conveyance of the subjects in question. Held (rev. judgment of First Division) that the ad valorem stamp which fell to be affixed to the deed in terms of the Stamp Act, 1870 (33 and 34 Vict. cap. 97), fell to be assessed on the whole sum paid by the railway company, and not merely on the first and second items. Commissioners of Inland Revenue v. Glasgow and South-Western Railway Co., May 20, 1887, H. L., p. 33.

STATUTE. Transference of statutory obligations—Roads and Bridges Act, 1878 (41 and 42 Vict. c. 51), sec. 32.

1. Held (in rev. judgment of Second Division) that sec. 32 of the Roads and Bridges Act, 1878, in providing that county road trustees to whom a road is thereby transferred shall be liable in all the debts, liabilities, claims, and demands, in which the trustees of such road "are or were liable under any general or local Act then in force," does not continue and transfer to the county road trustees the statutory powers and duties conferred and imposed by such prior Acts upon the trustees from whom the road is transferred, and that county trustees are not entitled to spend money raised by assessment for the maintenance of a road in lighting the same, although the trustees from whom the road had been transferred were bound to do so under a local Act. Lanarkshire (Lower Ward) Road Trustees v. Kelvinside Estate Trustees, Nov. 12, 1886, H. L., p. 18.

Prospective or retrospective—Volunteer corps subscription—Volunteer Act, 1863 (26 and 27 Vict. cap. 65).

2. The rules of a volunteer corps, made in terms of the Volunteer Act, 1863, were dated 26th March 1885, and provided, inter alia, that subscriptions of members to the regimental funds should fall due on the 31st October in each year for the twelve months preceding; and that all members of the corps should be liable for the full year's subscription, provided they had been members of the corps for one calendar month in the year. Held (diss. Lord Young) that a subscription was due for the year ending 31st October 1885, although four months of that year had elapsed when the rules were made. Morrison v. Neilson, Feb. 2, 1887, p. 452.

STATUTES.

1661, cap. 18. See Justiciary Cases, 9, 19.

1669, cap. 9. See Arrestment, 2.

1696, cap. 5. See Bankruptcy, 1.

Anne 1705, cap. 2. See Fishings, 2.

29 Geo. II. cap. 23. See Fishings, 2.

12 Geo. III. cap. 72 (Sexennial Limitation Act). See Bill of Exchange, 1.

48 Geo. III. cap. 151 (Administration of Justice and Appeals Act, 1808).

See Expenses, 4.

9 Geo. IV. cap. 58 (Home Drummond Act). See Justiciary Cases, 23.

1 and 2 Will. IV. cap. xlv. (Act to Extend the Royalty of Dundee, 1831).

See Burgh, 6.

2 and 3 Will. IV. cap. 68 (Day Trespass). See Justiciary Cases, 4.

1 and 2 Vict. cap. 114 (Personal Diligence Act). See Arrestment, 2.

5 and 6 Vict. cap. 35 (Property and Income-Tax, 1842). See Revenue, 1, 2, 3, 4.

STATUTES—Continued.

- 8 and 9 Vict. cap. 33 (Railways Clauses Act, 1845). See Railway, 1.
 8 and 9 Vict. cap. 83 (Poor-Law Amendment Act, 1845). See Poor.
 10 and 11 Vict. cap. 17 (Water-Works Clauses Act, 1847). See Mines and Minerals, 1.
 11 and 12 Vict. cap. 36 (Entail Amendment Act, 1848). See Entail, 2.
 15 and 16 Vict. cap. 27 (Evidence Act, 1852). See Process, 8.
 17 and 18 Vict. cap. 91 (Valuation of Lands Act, 1854). See Valuation Acts.
 17 and 18 Vict. cap. 104 (Merchant Shipping Act, 1854). See Justiciary Cases, 6.
 19 and 20 Vict. cap. 79 (Bankruptcy Act, 1856). See Bankruptcy—Judicial Factor, 1, 6.
 20 and 21 Vict. cap. 56 (Distribution of Business Act, 1857). See Process, 15, 16.
 24 and 25 Vict. cap. 70 (Locomotive Act, 1861). See Justiciary Cases, 8.
 24 and 25 Vict. cap. 84 (Trusts Act, 1861). See Trust, 1.
 25 and 26 Vict. cap. 35 (Public-House Acts Amendment Act, 1862). See Public-House.
 25 and 26 Vict. cap. 89 (Companies Act, 1862). See Company.
 25 and 26 Vict. cap. 101 (General Police and Improvement Act, 1862). See Burgh, 8—Road, 6, 9.
 26 and 27 Vict. cap. 65 (Volunteer Act, 1863). See Statute, 2—Ultra Vires.
 27 and 28 Vict. cap. 53 (Summary Procedure Act, 1864). See Justiciary Cases, 18, 19.
 29 and 30 Vict. cap. cclxxiii. (Glasgow Police Act, 1866). See Burgh, 4 and 5.
 30 and 31 Vict. cap. 96 (Debts Recovery Act, 1867). See Sheriff, 7.
 31 and 32 Vict. cap. 54 (Judgments Extension Act). See Foreign, 3.
 31 and 32 Vict. cap. 96 (Ecclesiastical Buildings Act, 1868). See Church, 1.
 31 and 32 Vict. cap. 100 (Court of Session Act, 1868). See Process.
 31 and 32 Vict. cap. 101 (Titles to Lands Consolidation Act, 1868). See Personal or Real.
 31 and 32 Vict. cap. 121 (Pharmacy Act, 1868). See Justiciary Cases, 10.
 31 and 32 Vict. cap. 123 (Salmon Fisheries, 1868). See Justiciary Cases, 5.
 33 and 34 Vict. cap. 97 (Stamp Act, 1870). See Stamp.
 35 and 36 Vict. cap. 62 (Education Act, 1872). See Justiciary Cases, 7.
 36 and 37 Vict. cap. 63 (Law-Agents Act, 1873). See Administration of Justice, 1.
 37 and 38 Vict. cap. 94 (Conveyancing Act, 1874). See Superior and Vassal, 2—Writ, 2.
 38 and 39 Vict. cap. 61 (Entail Amendment Act, 1875). See Entail, 3.
 38 and 39 Vict. cap. 62 (Summary Prosecutions Appeals Act, 1875). See Justiciary Cases, 15, 16, 17.
 39 and 40 Vict. cap. 36 (Customs Consolidation Act, 1876). See Revenue, 7.
 39 and 40 Vict. cap. 70 (Sheriff Court Act, 1876). See Bankruptcy, 3.
 40 and 41 Vict. cap. 50 (Sheriff Court Act, 1877). See Sheriff, 3.
 41 and 42 Vict. cap. 51 (Roads and Bridges Act, 1878). See Road, 7, 8, 9, 10, 11.
 41 and 42 Vict. cap. 58 (Locomotive Amendment Act, 1878). See Justiciary Cases, 8.
 42 and 43 Vict. cap. cxxxi. (Edinburgh Municipal and Police Act, 1879). See Justiciary Cases, 23.
 43 and 44 Vict. cap. 42 (Employers Liability Act, 1880). See Reparation, 11, 12, 13, 14.
 43 and 44 Vict. cap. 47 (Ground Game Act, 1880). See Justiciary Cases, 4.
 44 and 45 Vict. cap. 21 (Married Women's Property Act, 1881). See Husband and Wife, 2.
 44 and 45 Vict. cap. 33 (Summary Jurisdiction Act, 1881). See Justiciary Cases, 18, 19.

STATUTES—Continued.

- 44 and 45 Vict. cap. 37 (Alkali, &c. Works Regulation, 1881). See Justiciary Cases, 18.
- 44 and 45 Vict. cap. 47 (Presumption of Life Limitation Act). See Presumption, 1.
- 45 and 46 Vict. cap. 59 (Educational Endowments Act, 1882). See Trust, 13.
- 45 and 46 Vict. cap. 61 (Bills of Exchange Act, 1882). See Husband and Wife, 2.
- 45 and 46 Vict. cap. 77 (Citation Amendment Act, 1882). See Expenses, 7.
- 46 and 47 Vict. cap. 22 (Sea Fisheries Act, 1883). See Fishings, 1.
- 46 and 47 Vict. cap. 56 (Education Act, 1883). See Justiciary Cases, 7.
- 46 and 47 Vict. cap. 57 (Patents, Designs, and Trade-Marks Act, 1883). See Copyright, 2.
- 46 and 47 Vict. cap. 62 (Agricultural Holdings Act, 1883). See Lease, 5, 6, 7.
- 47 and 48 Vict. cap. 63 (Trusts Amendment Act, 1884). See Trust, 7, 8.
- 48 and 49 Vict. cap. 3 (Representation of the People Act, 1884). See Election Law, 1, 3.
- 48 and 49 Vict. cap. 51 (Customs and Inland Revenue Act, 1885). See Revenue, 5, 6.
- 49 and 50 Vict. cap. 26 (Guardianship of Infants Act, 1886). See Minor, 1.
- 49 and 50 Vict. cap. 29 (Crofters Holdings Act, 1886). See Lease, 8.

STOCK EXCHANGE. Agent and Principal—Contract for differences.

A stockbroker, in carrying over at the settlement £10,000 "Trunk Thirds" stock bought for a client, sent his client a continuation-note in these terms:—"I have continued for you as under. Sold 10,000 Trunk 3ds at £50, bought at £50, 3s. 3d. com. in a/c." In reality the broker had not bought that amount of stock at the price stated, but had bought a much larger quantity in different parcels and at different prices. These he lumped together and divided among those of his clients who had given him orders for Trunk Thirds, charging as the price the average of the different prices. This average price was that stated in the above continuation-note, and it corresponded to none of the individual prices. In an action by the stockbroker against the client for payment of the differences on a series of such transactions, held by a majority of seven Judges (viz., Lord Justice-Clerk, Lords Craighill, Shand, and Adam, diss. Lords Mure, Young, and Rutherford Clark), that in so purchasing the stock the pursuer was to be regarded as having bought it on his own account, and not as agent for the defender, and that the defender having employed the pursuer merely as a broker was not responsible, no special custom of trade in regard to brokers on the Stock Exchange having been averred or proved. Maffett v. Stewart, March 4, 1887, p. 506.

SUCCESSION. Conditio si sine liberis testator decesserit—Implied will.

1. A father executed a holograph will in 1878, when he was a widower, leaving his whole estates, heritable and moveable, to his two children nominationem. In 1884, before entering into a second marriage, he executed a marriage-contract in which he assigned £3000 to trustees to secure payment of an annuity of £150 to his second wife should she survive him, with directions to the trustees on her death, should she survive him, to divide the trust-funds among his children of both marriages equally, and, in the event of his wife predeceasing him, to restore the fund to himself, the marriage-contract, in that event, containing no provision for children of the second marriage. He died six months after this marriage, survived by his widow, who subsequently gave birth to a posthumous child. This child claimed a share of the provisions made for the other children in the holograph will in addition to a share of the trust fund. The Lord Ordinary (Kinnear) repelled the claim. Findlay's Trustees v. Findlays, Dec. 7, 1886, p. 167.

SUCCESSION—Continued.

Conjunct fee and liferent—Husband and Wife—Property coming from wife's family.

2. A father by an inter vivos deed gratuitously disposed to himself in liferent for his liferent use alienably, and to his daughter and her husband "in conjunct fee and liferent, and to the children" of the marriage equally share and share alike, "whom all failing, to the heirs and assignees whomsoever of the longest liver" of the spouses, certain heritable property belonging to him. The husband was the longest liver of the spouses, and he was survived by children of the marriage. Held that under the destination no fee ever vested in the husband. Brough v. Adamson, July 2, 1887, p. 858.

Construction—Extrinsic evidence.

3. In the construction of a will and codicils, the Court is entitled to have regard to the state of the testator's circumstances at the dates when they were written, but not to indications of intention appearing in jottings or memoranda by him. Trustees of the Free Church of Scotland v. Maitland, Jan. 14, 1887, p. 333.

Double legacy.

4. A testator in his settlement, dated in June 1862, bequeathed (subject to his widow's liferent, which extended over the whole estate) a sum of £6000 to the General Trustees of the Free Church of Scotland, towards an endowment of the Free Church College, subject to certain discretionary powers given to the General Assembly of that church. He bequeathed the residue to three nephews, to whom also he gave special legacies of £2000 each. In a codicil to the settlement executed in March 1864 he directed his trustees that "in addition to all sums therein bequeathed by me, and particularly in addition to the sum of £4000 therein bequeathed by me to my brother F. C. M., to pay to him the annual interest on the sum of £6000, and if they see cause to do so, to set apart the said sum for his liferent use and behoof; . . . and at decease of both these liferenters," namely, F. C. M. and his widow, "to pay the said principal sum of £6000 to the General Trustees of the Free Church of Scotland for the benefit of the Free Church College in Edinburgh, to be applied in such manner as the General Assembly of the said Free Church may direct." In a special case presented by the General Trustees of the Free Church, who claimed two legacies of £6000, and the residuary legatees, it appeared that the testator had entered annually in his books an estimate of his estate. The memorandum of January 1862 shewed a residue available for residuary legatees of £1931, 0s. 10d. The memorandum of 20th January 1864 (being three months before the date of the codicil) shewed a residue available for residuary legatees of £3176, 3s. 2d. The testator died in September 1865. The effect of the codicil as in 1864, assuming it to have created a new legacy of £6000, would have been to extinguish the residue and to diminish the prior legacies pro rata, including the legacy to F. C. M. Held that the codicil could not be construed as giving a second legacy of £6000 to the Free Church. Trustees of the Free Church of Scotland v. Maitland, Jan. 14, 1887, p. 333.

Election—Essential error.

5. A daughter, who had intimated to her father's trustees her election to take legitim in place of her testamentary provisions in the belief that her right to the whole legitim fund was admitted by the trustees, of whom her brother was one, subsequently, when her brother declared his intention to dispute her right to more than half of the legitim fund, withdrew her election and claimed the testamentary provisions. Held that she was not barred from doing so.

Opinion (per Lord Shand) that even if the error had been one of law, and whether induced by another or not, the daughter would have been entitled to withdraw her election. Inglis' Trustees v. Inglis, May 31, 1887, p. 740.

SUCCESSION—Continued.

Election—Withdrawal.

6. Question, whether an election well made and intimated can be withdrawn. Inglis' Trustees v. Inglis, May 31, 1887, p. 740.

Heritable or Moveable—Conversion—Intestacy.

7. A direction by a testator to convert will not affect the legal rights of the heir in heritage or the heirs in mobilibus, unless the succession is given to some other person.

A truster, by trust-deed and settlement, directed his trustees (1) to pay his debts; (2) to deliver to his wife his furniture and personal effects; and (3) "as soon after my death as possible, to realise the remainder of my said estate and effects, and divide and pay over the nett proceeds thereof in such manner" as he might direct by any writing under his hand. By subsequent codicil he directed his trustees "to dispose of the nett proceeds" of his estate "as follows:—To my widow an annuity as long as she lives of £70." He further left legacies to a considerable extent. At the death of the widow, and after the purposes of the trust were all fulfilled, the moveable estate was exhausted, but the heritable estate remained unsold. In a competition between the heir-at-law and the next of kin held (1) that the direction of the testator to realise the estate must be held to have been carried out, and (2) that the balance of the fund thus formed, after payment of the annuity and legacies, fell to be divided as intestate succession between the heir in heritage and the heirs in mobilibus in the proportions in which the fund had been derived from the testator's heritable and moveable estates respectively. Cowan v. Cowan, March 19, 1887, p. 670.

Legitim—Approbate and Reprobate—Provisions in marriage-contract not declared to be in satisfaction of legitim.

8. H. S., in his daughter's antenuptial marriage-contract, bound himself, within one month of the marriage, to convey £8000 in Government Stock to trustees, to hold in trust for the spouses and the longest liver of them in life-tenant allenerly, the fee to belong to the children of the marriage, whom failing, to such persons as H. S. might appoint, whom failing, to his heirs and successors whomsoever, "but under this provision that, notwithstanding the above destination, it shall be in the power of the said" daughter, "in the event of her having no children, or if they shall all predecease her without leaving issue, to dispose, by will or testamentary deed executed by her, of any part of the said trust-funds, not exceeding £4000 sterling." There was no clause by which the daughter accepted these provisions as in full of her legal rights over her father's estate. The father, H. S., executed a trust-settlement by which, in the event of his daughter and her husband dying without issue, the whole property liferented by the spouses was to be divided amongst certain legatees. After the father's death the daughter, in an action of multiplepoinding, claimed her legitim. The Court in that action found that she was not barred by her acceptance of the provisions in the marriage-contract from claiming legitim. The daughter thereafter, there being no issue of the marriage, exercised the power to test on the £4000, and also to claim as legitim half of the remaining £4000. In a question between the daughter's testamentary trustees and those of H. S., her father, held that the daughter was not barred from testing on the £4000, either (1) by having claimed legitim generally, or (2) by having claimed as legitim half of the remaining £4000. Somerville's Trustees v. Dickson's Trustees, June 3, 1887, p. 770.

Mutual settlement by spouses—Destination to "nearest in kin of us equally."

9. Two spouses by contract and mutual disposition disposed their whole estate to the survivor, and on the death of the survivor "to the nearest in kin of us, the said . . . equally." In a question between the sole next of kin of the wife and three next of kin of the husband, held, on a construction of the whole deed, that the estate fell to be divided among the next of kin of both spouses as a single class per capita. Hogg v. Bruce, July 8, 1887, p. 887.

SUCCESSION—Continued.

Mutual settlement by spouses—Protected Succession—Revocation.

10. A husband and wife executed a mutual deed whereby, on the narrative of their affection to each other, and for other good causes, they each bequeathed to the other, if survivor, the whole moveable estate of which the predeceaser might die possessed, and severally constituted the survivor executor and universal legatory of the predeceaser, and on the further narrative that they were desirous to settle the succession to their moveable estate in the event of the decease of the longest liver of them, they jointly and severally, and each of them, whichever of them might be the survivor, bequeathed the whole moveable property of which the longest liver might die possessed to certain relatives of the husband, one of whom was appointed executor to the surviving spouse. A power of revocation was reserved to the spouses jointly, and to the husband if survivor. The husband died shortly after the execution of the deed, and the wife survived for over twenty years. She had no separate estate, and her only means of support were her husband's moveable property, which she took under the deed, amounting to about £300, and the liferent of her husband's heritage, about £75 a-year, which she enjoyed under another settlement by him. She was able to save considerable sums of money, which she, with the view of defeating the legacies to her husband's relatives in the mutual deed, placed in bank on deposit-receipt or on current account in the names of various persons to whom she wished to make donations, who on her death uplifted the money, and declined to account therefor to the general legatees, who had been appointed executors-dative to the widow. The latter accordingly brought an action of count, reckoning, and payment. Held that the deed conveyed the moveable property of the predeceasing spouse to the survivor absolutely in fee, and that quoad ultra the deed was merely the testament of the surviving spouse and revocable by her, and that therefore the donations made by her, whether inter vivos or mortis causa, were effectual. Nicoll's Executors v. Hill, &c., Jan. 25, 1887, p. 384.

Vesting—Effect of ulterior destination of residue to "nearest of kin."

11. In a postnuptial contract of marriage the spouses conveyed, "each of them to the other, in case of his or her survivancy, in liferent," and to the children of their marriage in fee, divisible as after mentioned, their "whole estate and effects, heritable and moveable," it being declared "that the said funds and estate hereby settled upon the children of the present marriage in fee in manner above mentioned shall be divisible amongst such children in such shares as their father should appoint, and failing such appointment, equally." The deed further declared "that in the event of the dissolution of the said marriage by the predecease of any of the said spouses without leaving children, or of the decease of all such children during the lifetime of the survivor," then "it shall be in the power of the said married parties severally to dispose by testament of the proper share of the said funds and effects belonging to the said parties severally, but such disposition not to take effect until the decease of the longest liver of the said married parties, and failing any such disposition, then, and in that case, the said whole funds and estate settled by these presents shall, after the decease of the said parties, suffer division in manner after mentioned,—that is to say, the whole funds and estate above mentioned belonging or which may belong to" the husband "shall fall to and become the property of his own nearest of kin," and the wife's property to her nearest of kin. Then followed a declaration that the surviving spouse should, in the event of a second marriage, have power to settle the half of his or her estate on the spouse and children of the second marriage. The husband was survived by his wife and by one child, who predeceased his mother. In a competition for the husband's estate raised after the death of the surviving spouse between the representatives of the husband's nearest of kin at the date of his death and those nearest of kin to him at the date of his widow's death, held (diss. Lord Shand) (1) that the husband's estate did not vest in the legatees till the death of the surviving spouse; and (2) that the persons then called to the succession were his nearest of kin as at that date. Murray, &c. v. Gregory's Trustees, &c., Jan. 21, 1887, p. 368.

SUCCESSION—Continued.

Vesting—Destination over.

12. A trustor directed his trustees to retain a share of the residue of his estate and invest the same in their own names for behoof of the children nomi-natim of his brother "equally between and among them in liferent, and their lawful issues, born and to be born, equally among them in fee." In the event of the death of a child, payment was not to be made to his issue until the youngest of the issue attained majority. There was further a declaration that in the event of any of such issue "dying before the period fixed for division of their shares respectively leaving lawful issue, such issue shall come in place of the parent, and take and receive what the parent would have been entitled to if then in life." Held that the clause first above quoted imported an absolute gift to the issue of the children of the testator's brother, and that the subsequent clauses did not control the absolute character of that gift, and consequently that the fee of the shares vested in the issue of the children a morte testatoris. Byars' Trustees v. Hay, July 19, 1887, p. 1034.

Writ—Holograph unsigned document—Revocation by pencil marking.

13. Unsigned pencil alterations made by a testator on his testament written in ink will be presumed to be deliberative merely, but if there is evidence, parole or otherwise, to shew that he intended them to be final they will receive effect.

A trustor in his trust-deed directed his trustees to give effect to "any codicil or separate writing under my hand or signed by me, from which my trustees may be satisfied as to my wishes and intentions, notwithstanding the same may be defective in the solemnities required by law." By holograph codicil written in ink and signed he bequeathed £10,000 to the Magistrates of Glasgow, with directions how it was to be applied in charity. In his repositories these documents were found along with two other holograph pencil documents, which were both undated and unsigned. In one of these, headed "Notes as to settlement and alterations," he stated that he had "now meantime cancelled" his bequest to the Magistrates of Glasgow, "owing to losses on investments." The other was a list of charities to which he had left bequests, but that to the Magistrates was not mentioned. Through the bequest and instructions relative thereto in the holograph codicil were drawn perpendicular pencil lines, and along its margin was drawn in ink a bracket. It was admitted that a few months before his death the testator had called upon his law-agents and informed them that, having lost £30,000, he had resolved to make some alterations on his settlement and codicil, and that he got possession of these documents, which were at that time free from deletions and interlineations. Held that it had been proved that the bequest had been effectually cancelled by the trustor.

Question, whether the first unsigned holograph writing was a valid testamentary writing of the deceased. Lamont v. Magistrates of Glasgow, March 10, 1887, p. 603.

SUPERIOR AND VASSAL. Entry—Taxed entry—Assignees.

1. By a feu-contract dated in 1631, the Earl of Montrose feued to three of his kindly tenants and their "aires whatsomever (or assignayes, wha shall not exceed three chalders victuall in yeirlie standant rent)" a certain parcel of lands, the vassals binding themselves not only to pay the feu-duties, but to attend the Earl in time of war, and at frays and followings. The superior bound himself to receive the vassals and their heirs in and to the said lands, and also, "ony tennant that shall happin to buy the same frae the saids persons, or ony of them or yr fords (the buyers yrof not exceeding the rank above wryttine) . . . for payment of tenn pounds money for yr entrie to ilk five shilling land forsaid, and accepting ane new conqueiser yrintill." In 1886, after the feu-right had been more than once sold, the superior demanded a year's rent of the subjects as composition from a singular successor in the feu, entered by implied entry under the Conveyancing Act, 1874. The vassal tendered £10 Scots, and maintained that he was entitled to the benefit of the taxed entry. The only other heritable property belonging to him was a subject in Glasgow, the agricultural value of which was trifling, although it was valuable in other ways. Held (1) that although the superior had no longer an interest to exclude vassals above the rank of three chalders men, a vassal of that rank was yet entitled to claim the benefit of the taxation, and (2) that the defender was entitled to the benefit of the taxed entry, (a) because "assignayes" was intended to include any disponees of the real right after infestment, and (b) because the agricultural value of their property was the only measure by which the "three chalders victual in annual rent" could be determined. Duke of Montrose v. Provan's Trustees, Jan. 25, 1887, p. 378.

SUPERIOR AND VASSAL—Continued.

Entry—Implied entry—Trustees for payment of debts—Conveyancing Act, 1874 (37 and 38 Vict. cap. 94), sec. 4, subsecs. 1 and 3.

2. Held (by Lord Kinnear, Ordinary) that the infestment of trustees under a trust-disposition for payment of debts with power of sale does not divest the grantor of the feudal fee, and that an implied entry obtained by the trustees by recording the disposition does not per se entitle the superior to a casualty. Marquis of Huntly v. Earl of Fife, Dec. 5, 1885, p. 1091.

Building restriction.

3. A feu-charter provided that the vassal should within three years from the term of entry "erect and constantly maintain on the said piece of ground buildings of the value of £12,000 at least, which buildings shall consist of a range of four-storey tenements similar to those already built" in the street. The vassal was further taken bound to form and constantly maintain a foot-pavement "in front of the houses to be built on the said piece of ground . . . the foot-pavement being formed within the area of the said piece of ground to the extent of eight feet." After he had erected houses of the character and value specified, the vassal proposed to erect on a part of the ground as yet unbuilt on stables of one storey in height. He also proposed that these stables should come to the edge of his ground, without leaving eight feet for a foot-pavement. Held that he was within his right in both respects, the Court being of opinion (1) that the feu-charter could not be construed to import any restriction on building on the ground feued (except in regard to those buildings the erection of which was stipulated for), and (2) that the buildings which the vassal proposed to erect were not of a character to require him to form a foot-pavement in terms of the second of the clauses above quoted, although if he came to erect buildings of another class his obligation to form the foot-pavement might come into operation. Cowan v. Magistrates of Edinburgh, March 19, 1887, p. 682.
4. Opinions as to the effect of a stipulation in a feu-contract against the erection upon the feu of any house "for the carrying on any trade or manufacture which may operate as a nuisance to the neighbouring feuars." Manson v. Forrest, June 14, 1887, p. 802.

See Error, 1.

TITLE TO SUE AND DEFEND. Road—Road trustees—Barbed wires.

1. A proprietor of lands bordering a public road is not entitled to erect a barbed wire fence along the road, where such fencing is dangerous to persons or bestial using the road, and road trustees have a good title to sue an action against the proprietor for the purpose of having him ordained to remove the fence. Elgin County Road Trustees v. Innes, Nov. 10, 1886, p. 48.

Removal of law-agent's name from roll.

2. Observed (per Lord President) that the title to petition for the removal of the name of a law-agent from the roll is sufficient if the petitioner is himself a law-agent and has an interest to see that the roll is kept pure. Incorporated Society of Law-Agents in Scotland v. Clark, Dec. 3, 1886, p. 161.

TITLE TO SUE AND DEFEND—Continued.

Title of Magistrates to resist declarator of property of foreshore.

3. Held that the magistrates of a burgh, the inhabitants of which had been in use from time immemorial to resort to a particular piece of foreshore for purposes of recreation, had a good title to challenge a disposition which purported to convey that foreshore in property to a private person. Keiller v. Magistrates of Dundee, Dec. 7, 1886, p. 191.

Trust for creditors—Right of non-acceding creditor to sue trustee for share.

4. Where a debtor executed a trust-deed for behoof of acceding creditors, with the condition that all creditors acceding or receiving a dividend should be held to have discharged their claims in full, held (1) that a creditor who did not accede to the trust was entitled to a share of the estate in proportion to his debt unconditionally, and (2) that he was entitled to recover his share by direct action against the trustee. Ogilvie & Son v. Taylor, Jan. 27, 1887, p. 399.

Lease—Removing.

5. The estates of A were sequestrated in 1876, and his trustee sold to B his right and interest in an inn (which he held of the proprietor under a verbal lease). The trustee granted an assignation of the rents under declaration that "I have no title to the said subjects" beyond the act and warrant, and that "I will not be bound to give any, there being no written title or right either in me or in the said A, the subjects being possessed merely at the will of the proprietor." A continued in possession of the inn till his death in April 1886. In March 1886 B had raised an action of removing against him, which was in dependence at the date of his death. In May 1886 B presented a petition in the Sheriff Court for a warrant for the summary ejection of A's widow, in which he averred that he was proprietor of the subjects occupied by the defender, and founded on the assignation as his title. On this petition the Sheriff found that A's widow had no right or title to occupy the subjects, and granted warrant for her removal. A's widow brought a suspension thereof in the Court of Session. In his answers B averred that after the date of the assignation A occupied the subjects as his tenant under a verbal agreement to that effect. The Court (diss. Lord Shand, aff. judgment of Lord M'Laren) refused B a proof of his averments of tenancy, and suspended the proceedings complained of, on the ground that B had no title to sue the removing. Sinclair v. Leslie, June 9, 1887, p. 792.

TRAMWAY. See Reparation, 7, 13.

TRUST. Constitution—Whether trustees or executors—Trusts Act, 1861 (24 and 25 Vict. c. 84), sec. 1.

1. A testator in his will nominated certain persons as "executors," and directed them "to make and continue" certain annual payments to certain persons "till death or marriage," and to pay the liferent of his estate to his widow and a niece, and, on the death of the survivor of these two, to close their accounts at as early a date as practicable, and to divide the proceeds among specified persons. A "house, stable, and their fixtures," were to be sold soon after the testator's death. The executors were further directed to retain, or to realise for reinvestment, in their discretion, various securities, &c., held by him. There was no clause conveying any part of the estate to the executors. Held in a question between the co-executors, that though called "executors" in the deed, the executors were truly "gratuitous trustees nominated in a deed," and therefore were entitled to exercise the powers of assumption conferred on such trustees by sec. 1 of the Trusts Act, 1861. Ainslie, &c. v. Ainslie, Dec. 8, 1886, p. 209.

Administration—Assumption of new trustees.

2. By an antenuptial contract of marriage, dated in October 1860, the spouses provided that, in the case of the death, or resignation, or legal incapacity of the trustees named in the deed, it should be competent to them, the spouses, or to the survivor, to appoint new trustees, and also that the trustees should have power after the death of the survivor to assume new trustees. Held that this trust could not be held, during the lifetime of the survivor of the spouses, to include a power of assumption by the trustees nominated, the provisions of the deed being to the contrary. Munro's Trustees v. Young, March 9, 1887, p. 574.

TRUST—Continued.

Administration—Assignment—Intimation.

3. Intimation of an assignment of a beneficial right under a trust was made to A, one of the two trustees. The other trustee was in bad health, but was able for business, and had not resigned. The funds were in A's hands, and he managed the whole affairs of the trust. Held that the intimation was sufficient. Jameson v. Sharp, March 18, 1887, p. 643.

Administration—Advances out of income.

4. Circumstances in which the Court authorised advances to be made out of the income of trust-funds directed to be accumulated, being of opinion that it was highly expedient, if not necessary, for the maintenance and education of the beneficiaries that such advances should be made. Websters v. Miller's Trustees, Feb. 26, 1887, p. 501.

Administration—Anticipation of period of payment.

5. A father and mother in the antenuptial marriage-contract of their son bound themselves to convey by deeds (which they subsequently executed), to take effect at their respective deaths, their heritable and moveable estates to their son's marriage-contract trustees for behoof of their son in liferent, for his liferent use alienably, and of the children of the marriage in fee. After the death of his father and mother the son, as their heir-at-law and sole next of kin, with consent of his wife, called upon the trustees to convey the estates to him, on the ground that no child had been born of the marriage, which had subsisted for thirty-nine years, and that his wife was now sixty-one years of age. In a special case presented by the marriage-contract trustees and the son, held that he was entitled to the conveyance. Urquhart's Trustees v. Urquhart, Nov. 23, 1886, p. 112.

Administration—Investment—Personal liability of trustees.

6. Circumstances in which family trustees, with the fullest powers of investment on such securities, heritable or personal, as they should think proper, were made liable for the loss of a sum lent to a member of the family on insufficient security. Millar's Factor v. Millar's Trustees, Nov. 2, 1886, p. 22.

Administration—Investment—Trust Amendment Act, 1884 (47 and 48 Vict. c. 63).

7. A curator bonis, being a trustee in the meaning of the Trusts Amendment Act, 1884, is entitled to invest the funds in his hands as curator in the purchase of the stocks and in the loans authorised as trust investments by that Act, notwithstanding that the registration of his name as holder of these stocks cannot by the practice of the Bank of England, where a large number of these stocks are transferable, be qualified by any entry to shew the character in which he holds them, the Bank of England declining to take cognisance of trusts. Accountant of Court v. Crumpton's Curator Bonis, Nov. 12, 1886, p. 55.
8. Observations on the expression "approved by the Court of Session" with reference to the investments authorised as trust investments by the Trusts Act, 1884.

Observed (per Lord Adam) that stocks approved of in a particular application for approval were not thereby pronounced to be eligible in all cases or in any other case than that before the Court. Accountant of Court v. Crumpton's Curator Bonis, Nov. 12, 1886, p. 55.

Administration—Investment—Loan over buildings in course of erection.

9. Buildings in course of erection are not a security on which a judicial factor is entitled to lend trust-funds.

TRUST—Continued.

Circumstances in which a judicial factor was held liable to make good a loss of trust-funds arising out of a loan over subjects in course of building, which afterwards proved insufficient to meet it. Guild v. Glasgow Educational Endowments Board, July 16, 1887, p. 944.

Administration—Investment—Real security.

10. Held that an English will authorising investments on "real security" authorised investment on a railway mortgage. Breatcliff, &c., v. Bransby's Trustees, Jan. 11, 1887, p. 307.

Administration—Warrandice—Personal liability of trustee.

11. A person infest as trustee in certain heritable subjects, after consenting to certain bonds being granted over them by his author, which were duly recorded, granted a bond and disposition in security for a new loan which he acknowledged to have received, and bound himself to repay "as trustee." In security of the personal obligation he disposed the subjects "as trustee," and the bond further contained this clause—"I grant warrandice." In an action by the last bondholder upon the clause of warrandice against the representative of the trustee, held that the trustee was personally bound in warrandice from fact and deed, and was liable for loss arising from the prior bonds to which he was a consenter. Horsbrugh's Trustees v. Welch, Nov. 12, 1886, p. 67.

Administration—Transaction between trustees and beneficiaries—Mora.

12. A testator died in 1844. By his settlement he left legacies to A and to other persons to the amount of £17,000, and life annuities amounting to £100 per annum, but he died intestate quoad residue. His heritable and moveable estates were large, but he had extensive liabilities undertaken for three trading and manufacturing concerns, whose estates were conveyed to trustees named by him in security of his advances. He was also liable for annuities to the extent of £350, which did not admit of valuation. In the years 1846 and 1847 the trustees made payment to the legatees of one-half of their legacies, but delayed payment of the remainder. In 1849 A and other legatees employed two law-agents to attend to their respective interests. The trust affairs being very complicated, by direction of the trustees the firm of J. & S., their law-agents, laid the trust-accounts before an accountant. The accountant's reports, after estimating unrealised assets and liabilities, shewed that probably the trust-funds would not be sufficient to pay the legacies and testamentary annuities in full. On 2d September 1851 the trustees, through their law-agents, offered to compromise the claims of the legatees by payment of the legacies in full without interest, on condition that they obtained from the legatees an assignation of their claims and a discharge from the next of kin. On 20th September 1851 this offer was accepted by the law-agents for the legatees and next of kin. Subsequently the trustees having discovered another liability of the deceased for £1700, proposed to rescind from the agreement, but the agents for the legatees threatened legal proceedings if it was not implemented. In February 1852 a deed was executed by A as one of the legatees, and also as one of the next of kin, and by the other legatees and next of kin, by which, in consideration of the legacies having been paid in full, they assigned their whole claims against the trust to a person as trustee for J. & S. J., one of the partners of J. & S., was one of the trustees. In 1886 the representatives of A raised a reduction of the deed of assignation and discharge against the representatives of the trustees, based on general averments of fraud, misrepresentation, and concealment and an averment that the pursuers had been greatly prejudiced by the deed, and on the plea that as the transaction involved the purchase of the trust-estate by one of the trustees, it was illegal. At the date of the action nearly all those who had taken part in bringing about the arrangement were dead. The Court assoluted the defenders, holding that fraud had not been proved, and that, quoad ultra, the action had not been timely raised,—Lord Young and Lord Craighill further holding that no relevant ground of action had been stated. Buckner v. Jopp's Trustees, July 16, 1887, p. 1006.

TRUST—Continued.

Charitable and Educational Trust—Educational Endowments Act, 1882 (45 and 46 Vict. c. 59)—Scope of Act, and discretion of the Commissioners.

13. A trustor left the residue of his estate to be applied "towards the maintenance and promotion of religious ordinances and education and missionary operations" in a certain district, "and that by means of payments for the erection and support of churches and schools belonging to and in connection with" certain religious bodies. The trustees were to consist of members of these bodies in full communion with them. It was declared in the trust-deed that "the application and appropriation of the trust-funds shall be entirely at the option and discretion of the quorum of my said trustees as to the proportions thereof to be applied to the said several objects." The Commissioners under the Educational Endowments Act, 1882, having framed a scheme, whereby the administration of a part of the trust-funds (being the average amount annually devoted by the trustees to educational purposes) was transferred to a governing body, and the funds were devoted to the advancement of higher education in the district, the trustees submitted a case to the Court under the Act 1882, pleading, first, that the fund was not an educational endowment in the sense of the Act, and second, that the scheme was not in conformity with its provisions, as having diverted to educational purposes funds in use to be applied to other charitable purposes, and as not having had "regard to the spirit of the founder's intentions." Held (1) that the fund was in part an educational endowment in the sense of the statute, the discretion given to the trustees not entitling them to withhold all payments from any of the three trust purposes; and (2) that the Court could not review the Commissioners in the exercise of the discretion committed to them by the statute in determining the proportion of the endowment to be applied to educational purposes in the case of a mixed endowment, or as to the proper amount of regard to be shewn to the spirit of the founder's intention. Ferguson Bequest Fund v. Commissioners on Educational Endowments, March 15, 1887, p. 624.

Charitable and Educational Trust—Alteration of purposes.

14. The Court approved of a scheme by which a trust constituted in the Glasgow Royal Infirmary, "for a fever convalescent home when erected," was altered into a trust "towards payment of the cost of a nurses' home," the purpose of erecting a fever convalescent home, which was in the mind of the directors of the infirmary when the original trust was constituted, having been abandoned as unnecessary. Glasgow Infirmary, March 19, 1887, p. 680.

Church—Cy près.

15. Circumstances in which it was held that it had not been proved that the purposes of a trust under which a dissenting place of worship had been built had failed, and petition to have the trust property conveyed to the church of which the congregation had originally formed a part dismissed. Thomson v. Anderson, July 19, 1887, p. 1026.

See Church, 4.

ULTRA VIRES. Volunteer Act, 1863 (26 and 27 Vict. cap. 65), secs. 24, 25, and 27.

Held that the rules for the management of the property, finances, and civil affairs of a corps, made and approved in terms of the Volunteer Act, 1863, may competently include rules providing for the payment of subscriptions by officers (both active and honorary) to the funds of the corps, and that such subscriptions so provided for may be recovered in a Court of law. Morrison v. Neilson, Feb. 2, 1887, p. 452.

See Minor and Pupil, 2—Superior and Vassal, 2.

UNIVERSITY. See Copyright, 1.

VALUATION ACTS. Conclusiveness of Valuation-roll—Poor-Law (Scotland) Amendment Act, 1845 (8 and 9 Vict. cap. 83), sec. 37.

1. A parochial board assessed for poor-rates the owner and occupier of water-works on the annual value of the subjects appearing in the Valuation-roll without allowing deduction of the average cost of repairs, insurance, &c., in terms of the 37th section of the Poor-Law Act, 1845, on the ground that the assessor in preparing the Valuation-roll had already made these deductions. In a suspension held (1) that for the purposes of assessment under the Poor-Law Act, 1845, the Valuation-roll as completed in terms of the Valuation of Lands (Scotland) Act, 1854, was conclusive as to the yearly rent or value of lands and heritages entered therein, and that the Court of Session had no jurisdiction to review the process by which the entry there made was reached, and (2) that before assessment the suspender was entitled to have the above deductions made from the sum entered in the Valuation-roll. Magistrates of Glasgow v. Hall, Jan. 14, 1887, p. 319.

“Consideration other than the rent”—“Power” to make improvements.

2. Terms of a lease conferring “power” on the tenant to make improvements on a harbour which was the subject of the lease, which were held to provide for a consideration other than the rent in the sense of the Lands Valuation Act, 1854, sec. 6. Prestongrange Coal and Fire-Brick Co., Limited, v. Assessor for Haddingtonshire, March 9, 1887, p. 589.

“Consideration other than the rent”—Goodwill.

3. A sum of money paid by a tenant to his landlord in name of “goodwill” on obtaining a lease of premises previously occupied by the landlord, is in the general case to be regarded as “a consideration other than the rent” named in the lease paid for the occupation of the premises, and as such is to be divided by the number of years for which the lease is to run, and the quotient added every year to the rent.

In addition to a rent of £48 yearly named in the lease of a hotel for seven years, the tenant agreed to pay to the landlord a sum of £220 in name of goodwill, the landlord who had previously been in occupation of the hotel becoming bound not to commence business as a hotel-keeper in opposition to the tenant. Held that this obligation by the landlord was a valuable consideration, apart from the occupation of the premises, for which compensation was due by the tenant, and consequently that a proportion was to be deducted from the sum of £220 before making any addition to the rent named in the lease in terms of the above rule. Determination of the Magistrates deducting one-half from the £220 on this principle affirmed. Assessor for Lanark v. Selkirk, March 9, 1887, p. 579.

4. A sum paid by the incoming to the outgoing tenant in name of goodwill is not to be taken into account in reaching the value of the subjects, even when the outgoing tenant is one of the joint proprietors of the subjects. Assessor for Kilmarnock v. Allan, March 9, 1887, p. 581.

5. M offered to take the premises of which Mrs B was tenant, under a lease of which three years were yet to run, and to pay her £400 in name of goodwill, provided the proprietor would cancel her lease and grant him a new one for seven years. The proprietor would consent only if he received £50 from M and £70 from Mrs B. M and Mrs B agreed to these terms, and a new lease for seven years was granted at the old rent. Held that both the £50 and the £70 so received by the proprietor were considerations other than the rent to be taken into account in reaching the valuation of the subjects. Assessor for Kilmarnock v. M’Nally, March 9, 1887, p. 582.

Principle of valuation—Gas-works belonging to gas company.

6. Gas-works, the property of a gas company, were valued by the assessor on the principle of taking the cost of the company’s works, less an allowance for depreciation, and assessing the annual value at a percentage on the balance. The company maintained that the works ought to be valued on the principle of taking the revenue of the company for their preceding financial year, and deducting therefrom the expenses (excluding capital expenses), and also deducting 5 per cent on the expenses in name of tenants’ profits—the balance being taken as the value of the subjects. The Magistrates confirmed the assessor's valuation. The company appealed. The Judges being divided in opinion (in accordance with their respective opinions in the Falkirk case, Feb. 24, 1883, 10 R. 651), the valuation stood. Edinburgh Gas-Light Co. v. Assessor for Leith, March 9, 1887, p. 583.

VALUATION ACTS—Continued.

Lease of Minerals and of Harbour—Duration of lease.

7. Question, whether a lease of minerals for thirty-one years, and of the harbour dues of a harbour adjacent to the minerals and belonging to the same proprietor for twenty-one years with right to use, but not to use exclusively, the harbour for the purposes of the mineral workings, was to be construed as a lease of the harbour for thirty-one years, entitling the assessor to enter the tenants on the Valuation-roll as proprietors of improvements which they had executed on the harbour. Opinion per Lord Lee that it was not; per Lord Fraser contra. Prestongrange Coal and Firebrick Co., Limited, v. Assessor for Haddingtonshire, March 9, 1887, p. 589.

VOLUNTEER. See Statute, 2—Ultra Vires.

WARRANTICE. See Heir and Executor, 1—Trust, 11.

WRIT. Description of lands.

1. A bond and disposition in security contained this description of the security subjects,—“All and Whole that piece of ground fronting Baker Street of Aberdeen, in the burgh and county of Aberdeen, being the subjects and others particularly described in the feu-charter thereof granted by” certain persons named and designed “in my favour, dated the 6th and 7th, and recorded in the Division of the General Register of Sasines applicable to the county of Aberdeen on the _____, all days of November 1882.” The foregoing were the only subjects in Baker Street, Aberdeen, belonging to the granter. Held (per Lord Trayner, Ordinary) that apart from the provisions of the Conveyancing Act, 1874, sec. 61, and schedule O, there was in the bond a sufficient description of the subjects. Murray's Trustee v. Wood, July 2, 1887, p. 856.

Description of lands—Description by reference—Conveyancing Act, 1874 (37 and 38 Vict. cap. 94), sec. 61, and schedule O.

2. In a description of lands by reference to a prior recorded deed, under the Conveyancing Act, 1874, sec. 61, and schedule O, the omission to state the day of the month on which the prior deed was recorded will not invalidate the subsequent deed. Murray's Trustee v. Wood, July 2, 1887, p. 856.

Delivery—Trust—Policy of insurance in favour of wife and children.

3. Held (rev. judgment of Lord McLaren) that a policy of insurance taken by a husband in favour of trustees for behoof of his wife and the children of the marriage did not confer a vested right in the beneficiaries without delivery, actual or constructive, of the policy.

Circumstances which were held not to amount to delivery of a policy of insurance taken by a husband in favour of trustees for behoof of his wife and children. Jarvie's Trustee v. Jarvie's Trustees, Jan. 28, 1887, p. 411.

Succession—Revocation by pencil marking.

4. Unsigned pencil alterations made by a testator on his testament written in ink will be presumed to be deliberative merely, but if there is evidence, parole or otherwise, to shew that he intended them to be final they will receive effect. Lamont v. Magistrates of Glasgow, March 10, 1887, p. 603.

Stanford Law Library

3 6105 062 686 873

